We are entitled to ask why we must have that strange time scale, that opening and closing and extension of dates. What contender felt it necessary to go back time and again to the RAF to have the time scale opened up for it? We know that in terms of its handling, stalling, spinning, aerobatics and flying qualities, the PC9 was entirely suitable for the RAF training role. It was highly regarded. Any modifications that might have been needed could have been carried out within the bid price without any problem. However, we know that the other main contender had to go back on three if not four occasions to Boscombe Down for further reappraisal and training. It has had not one but four engine changes. Therefore, we must ask why decisions were made to try to make particular allowance for that aircraft, the Tucano. We must ask why it is still in the field.

The Tucano does not offer as many jobs as the PC9. In terms of foreign sales, it offers nothing compared with the PC9, particularly when Embraer has made arrangements for sales in South America and Egypt. The planes for the middle east market would be built in Egypt.

Why has the Tucano remained in the field? Jobs are very important for the Northern Ireland Office. That is understandable. I appreciate what it is seeking to do. However, where the plane is to be built in Belfast, unemployment is no worse than it is in Humberside and parts of Scotland. In this bid, we have not heard Shorts making any of the promises that it made to the United States about building the Sherpa in parts of Belfast , which it had to do to achieve that order. I should like the Minister to say whether Shorts——

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: I shall give way in a moment, but the hon. Gentleman is taking up other people's time as well as mine.

I should like the Minister to say whether Shorts has given any undertaking about building the aircraft in the old De Lorean factory in west Belfast, if the company got the order.

Mr. Beggs: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in good faith, the Fair Employment Agency accepted Shorts' commitment that in future there would be equal opportunity for all sections of the community to find employment with that company?

Mr. McNamara: I accept that the company said that. We are waiting for the evidence that that will be carried through.

There is also the Foreign Office interest in the matter because of its interest in Brazil. It wants to repay part of the debt that we owe Brazil for its benevolent neutrality during the Falklands war. We understand that. But I suspect that the real reason why Shorts is so interesting to the Government has nothing to do with jobs in Northern Ireland or debts being repaid to the Brazilians. It is purely and simply the ideological reason that the Government want to privatise Shorts in the same way as they have already privatised British Aerospace. I say that not only because of my natural suspicion of the Department of Trade and Industry with its present head and its record on privatisation, but because of what was said by the managing director of Shorts, reported in the Prufrock column in the Sunday Times on 10 February, which stated:

> "Then, music to the ears of Norman Tebbit at Industry: 'The Tucano will get us into military aircraft work, which we haven't got at the moment. Having some military work will make us a better prospect for privatisation.'" —said the managing director.

That is what it is all about. That is what Tucano is all about. That is why the RAF might be given an aeroplane with problems with its stalling characteristics, landing characteristics, low-level ride and marginal speed and flying performance. All those things are being sacrificed; and the RAF's interests are being sacrificed to the Government's ideological attitude and the Secretary of State's desire for privatisation. We should not accept that for the RAF. We want the best plane, capable of filling the air staff target in the best way. The only plane that has never had to go back to Boscombe Down for a second, third or fourth re-run, and that has been able to carry through all its training, is the PC9. That is why we expect to have it in the United Kingdom. We want to have it in Brough and Prestwick, and we want the 2,000 jobs over 10 years and the 2,500 other jobs in the industry.

The Minister of State opened the debate in a characteristic manner, glossing over all the difficulties, barely mentioning the problems and suggesting that somehow, with a wave of the magic wand, they will disappear. They will not disappear. They will accumulate. The Government will have to postpone, cut and cancel programmes, not only because the budget for the forces has been overcommitted already, because the Ministry felt that it could spend freely, with the great increases in the budget over the past five years, but, more important, because, as Trident goes ahead, as dollar costs increase and as the pressures increase, the pressures on the RAF and our ability to defend ourselves conventionally will increase. The Government will be condemned by the nation for that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Before I call the next hon. Member, I should like to remind the House that the 10-minute limit on speeches is now in operation. To assist hon. Members, I shall use a little sign language when they are beginning to run out of time.

7.7 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): It is a rare occasion when I can agree with at least two points made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). The first was his comment about the Tornado order to Turkey, with which I heartily agree. I understand that the Turkish defence authorities have never reneged on any arms purchase. It is an extremely important front-line country and a NATO ally, which we should supply with our products.

The other comment that the hon. Gentleman made was that the debate is likely to be substantially about procurement. He may not know that in my constituency Westland Helicopters has its second largest installation, employing about 1,600 people. It is the largest employer

[Mr. A. E. P. Duffy]

Even conventional improvements would not achieve enhanced security in Europe. Negotiated reductions of conventional forces and the implementation of militarily significant confidence-building measures represent an alternative and complementary method of pursuing enhanced security and conventional stability in Europe.

Arms control considerations are often overlooked in the debate on conventional force improvement, but two forums offer enhanced European security through confidence building and reduction of conventional forces — the conference on disarmament in Europe and the mutual and balanced force reduction negotiations. Reconciling the various and sometimes divergent economic, military and political considerations in the current Alliance discussions on improving conventional deterrence is of paramount importance if the conventional force debate of the 1980s is to be positive rather than divisive—that is, if we are to achieve some success in reducing NATO's reliance on nuclear arms.

Sir Patrick Wall (Beverley): I join with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) in his complaint about the timing of the debate. It is quite disgraceful to debate each service on one day only per year and then start after three statements and business questions. I want to make a few points about NATO and finish with a constituency point.

The House will know that the Soviet army attacks on a narrow front but in great depth — the first echelon about 50 km behind and the second echelon about 100 to 150 km behind. Currently, the second echelon would have to be attacked by the Tornado, which I believe would mean a high rate of attrition. I believe that the aircraft could be shot down easily.

The most important thing for the RAF is to have a long-range stand-off missile. The Navy has the Sea Eagle, but the RAF has no long-range stand-off missile. As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) said, I understand that a memorandum of understanding has been signed between the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany. May we be told the approximate production date? It is most urgent.

In the near future, that task will be undertaken by the multiple launch rocket system phase III, with its terminally guided sub-munitions and its much longer range, by the Copperhead laser-guided shell and by the Assault Breaker that will release the Tornado for its proper job, which is to counter the enemy air forces.

The second most important issue is to destroy the enemy airfields after the first strike has left. That can be done by the JP233, but again that is not stand-off. I do not believe that the three Tornado aircraft coming in and dropping JP233 could survive. In future the cruise missile and possibly a conventional ballistic missile such as the Pershing I, which has been withdrawn, might be used for that purpose. Aircraft are in short supply and should be used for countering the enemy aircraft threat. They must be safeguarded as much as possible when on the ground. The Nunn-Roth amendment led to an increased expenditure on NATO infrastructure—$7·8 billion was allocated recently, among other things, to strengthen shelters for the RAF and allied air forces. Since 1951, NATO infrastructure has provided 229 runways in Europe, which is a very good record.

We have already discussed Nimrod III compared with AWACS. I admit that many Conservative Members wanted Nimrod III, although many others advocated the NATO AWACS. This is a lesson for us. These international projects are sometimes much more expensive, but they are brought to fruition at a reasonable cost, are difficult to cancel, and do not give rise to the cost escalation that is bound to arise with Nimrod III.

Another means of detecting enemy aircraft is NIS-NATO identification system — which in my day was known as IFF. For years different air forces have had different identification systems. It has been said time and again that RAF aircraft could be shot down by our allies unless we had a common standard. I understand that the United Kingdom, France and Germany have agreed on a common system, but that the Americans are advocating another. I hope that these systems will be standardised, because it is not much good having two systems in the Alliance.

As to the European fighter, I merely remind the House that the Americans are at the same time developing their own advanced tactical fighter. It is a different type and has a longer range, and I do not believe that the European fighter will have much chance of success unless there is some arrangement with the Americans on comparability, common sales and so on. ASRAAM and AMRAAM have also been mentioned. Both are currently in difficulty. The European contribution, ASRAAM, has been held up twice by Germany's failure to produce the cash on time, although I now gather that it is again on line. This time the American AMRAAM has gone wrong and it is being examined by the Secretary of State.

I remind the Government that Ford aircraft in America are going ahead with the AIM9M, which it hopes will take the place of both ASRAAM and AMRAAM if they go wrong. Therefore, we had better look to our laurels.

SDI is purely a research project, but it will cost $26 billion. It is non-nuclear defence. If it succeeds, it is expected to bring down all ballistic missiles, including the SS20, SS21, SS22 and SS24 — the shorter-range battlefield weapons. SDI intercepts at the boost stage before the decoys are deployed and when it can home in on the heat. It also intercepts at the mid phase and at the terminal phase. I stress again that it is non-nuclear——

Mr. McNamara rose——

Sir Patrick Wall: I would rather not give way as I am short of time.

SDI depends largely on laser particle beams and kinetic energy, some of the lasers being reflected by mirrors. It also depends on very high speed integrated circuits—the most modern computer technology.

Are we keeping up to date with this research? The Prime Minister mentioned this in Washington only yesterday, but I should like to know whether we are keeping up to date with the computer technology which is an essential part, not only of SDI but of all advanced technology affecting the RAF.

The PC-9 will be built largely in my constituency. It is favoured by the RAF—at least that is what we are given to understand. I also understand that 85 per cent. of the aeroplane will be built in this country as well as 75 per cent. of the equipment—the most valuable part of any aircraft. There are joint marketing arrangements with the Swiss and, most important, this is a package with the Hawk. If countries buy the PC-9, they will buy the Hawk. I am pretty certain that the Swiss will buy the Hawk if we choose the PC-9.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Does my hon. Friend agree that the decision to purchase the new trainer should be based on what the RAF believes best meets its purposes, not on employment considerations or the desirability or otherwise of floating a company on the market?

Sir Patrick Wall: I agree with my hon. Friend. I remind the House that Shorts has just won a lucrative aircraft contract which will keep it pretty well occupied for some time, and that Humberside and the Prestwick area of Scotland could benefit by about 2,000 jobs if we were to order the PC-9. I commend to the Government early-day motion 217 which has been signed by more than 100 hon. Members. I very much hope that our choice will be the best aircraft, the one which the RAF wants.

I do not expect the Minister to answer any of my latter points, but I should like him to reply to my comments on NATO, IFF, and long-range stand-off missiles, which will be vital in any battlefield of the future.

7.35 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall) tempts me to discuss the SDI and the broader questions that are now before us. However, I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if, in view of the time, I concentrate on one issue—Westland, which is of special interest to my constituency.

I should declare an interest, apart from my constituency interest, in that my only shareholding in British industry is in Westland. It is a modest sum of £20 which enables me to attend the annual general meeting. It is certainly no speculative, profit-making deal.

I wish to concentrate my remarks on the AST404, the replacement for the Wessex and Puma helicopters. The AST404 was originally due in 1987-88, but the in-service date has now been extended to 1991. Recently, it may even have been put on the back burner—the so-called regulator—with no funds yet identified. That causes concern.

The RAF's need for a replacement for the Wessex fleet is unquestionable and urgent. About that there can be no doubt. The Wessex fleet now supports our troops in Northern Ireland, but in time of war would be used to support our forces on the central front. These aircraft are 26 years old, and were designed in the 1950s. I was disturbed when the Minister said that perhaps this aircraft would be run on to the NH90, because the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) rightly identified the fact that these collaborative projects almost never meet their targeted in-service delivery date. The Minister may talk about 1994 or 1995, but he knows as well as I do that the NH90 will probably not become available until the year 2000. Are the Government really asking the RAF to use aircraft—the main element of its fleet—whose design is 50 years old? We have good reason to wonder how long an essential component of our defence can depend on these clapped-out machines. They are good machines for their age, which have done sterling service in their time. I have had good reason to know that, having flown to and from active service in them in Borneo, Aden and Belfast. However, these machines need replacing soon—indeed, now.

As other hon. Members have said, the helocopter's role in the battlefield is that of a force multiplier. It should be used to make better use of our forces. That is vital and is well recognised elsewhere. If there is an imbalance with the disposition of Soviet forces in central Europe, which I accept, we can overcome that through the use of helicopters.

As the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare also said, other nations seem to be much more aware of this than the Ministry of Defence. A typical American corps in central Europe will have 800 helicopters at its disposal, whereas a typical United Kingdom corps will have 180. All defence experts now recognise the increased and growing role of the helicopter in the battlefield. To meet that requirement, the Government have set up air staff target 404. There are three contenders, but only one is British—the Westland W-30. The W-30 meets in full, admittedly with no frills or fur trimming, the precise requirements laid down by the RAF. Unlike other competitors, the W-30 is designed to meet the need fully but not excessively. That is why it seems that the costs will be about 30 per cent. lower than those of foreign opposition. Running costs will also be lower.

We have made a considerable investment in the W-30, which is the derivative from which Westland will build its aircraft. The Department of Trade and Industry has invested £40 million in it, and Westland has done an almost pound-for-pound matching investment of about £35 million. There have been further investments in the blades and gearboxes. My community and that of the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare have also invested their ingenuity and skill in that aircraft. That stands at stake on the Government's decision.

Considerable opportunities also stand at stake. Exports may be more than double our sales to the RAF. If the RAF's imprimatur is on the aircraft and we can say to other countries that the British Government have bought the aircraft, we may be able to sell twice as many as we would supply to the RAF. That would give us a prime position in the European collaborative deal, the NH90.

Westland is a committed collaborator, as the EH101 shows. The W-30 would provide 6,800 man years work, which is about 1,000 jobs in production, 400 in support, and a further 2,000 in the other British industries that supply Westland. A typical helicopter today is only 50 per cent. in house, and the other 50 per cent. is bought in from other industries all over Britain. Therefore, there would be about 4,000 jobs overall. We would maintain a major British defence industry in a strong condition. We would maintain a stand-alone capacity to make our own helicopters. We would also maintain in the best condition a firm which is about to produce a key new helicopter, the EH101. There is a necessity to build a bridge from the present position to the EH101 in the early 1990s.

I recognise the Secretary of State's problems, as all hon. Members must do. They may be generated by Trident. We recognise that he now faces a matrix of difficult decisions. I remember calling Trident "that cuckoo in the nest", and he is now undoubtedly finding good reasons to elbow other projects out of its way. I do not wish to make a political point about this, but Trident in my constituency, which has an unemployment rate of about 2 per cent. above the national average, and the highest in the county of Avon.

I should like to refer to the A20, which fills air staff requirement 412. The big criticism that is thrown at that aircraft is that it has never flown. However, I must say to the critics who see that as some sort of a bull point that the Royal Air Force is now capable of making an assessment of an aeroplane that has not flown. In most cases, it has purchased aeroplanes that have not even been beyond the drawing board, let alone tested. With the latest computer technology, that should not be a barrier.

As a result of the retendering process, there has been a substantial change in the status of the A20, the most important point being the offer of the installation of the Garrett engine. I recall being told some horrendous figures about spare parts stocking for the RAF because of the many different types that we still have in operation. One of the advantages of the Garrett engine is that it is already in service in the Jetstream, so, we hope, there will not be a duplicate requirement for many of the spare parts. It is now the fastest and best performing aircraft because of the installation of this high-powered engine. On those two grounds alone, I should have thought that the A20 was very much back in contention.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): My hon. Friend will acknowledge that the Royal Air Force Jetstreams are not Jetstream 31s; they are the ordinary Astazon-powered variety.

Mr. Wiggin: I am informed that there is quite a commonality of parts in these Garrett engines. That will be a plus point in relation to the new offer.

The Australians, who are in partnership on this project, have taken this opportunity to reduce substantially their prices. I understand that the price of the A20 is now much more competitive. It may well be, of course, that the competitors have taken the opportunity to cut their prices. I sincerely hope that those factors will weigh with the Government.

British Aerospace and the Shorts contender will be competing for worldwide sales with their partners' less sophisticated aircraft. The A20 will be wholly made within the partnership, and there will be no competition with less sophisticated versions worldwide.

The A20 has the Hawk cockpit and is designed specially to fulfil completely the air staff requirement as written and is not a modified aeroplane. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister will be bored sick with hearing the various merits of the competitors in this contest. A noble Lord in the other place said that this was the first competitive tender for an RAF aeroplane for 70 years. That seems to be a strange statement, but I cannot think of an example in recent years. This has done the colour brochure printing industry much good, to say nothing of the expensive meals that aircraft manufacturers have found it necessary to give hon. Members. Westland, because of its natural diffidence, has not until now been accustomed, because of its position as a sole supplier, to flying its flag as high as we would wish. I shall send my right hon. Friend the Minister particulars on the A20.

It would be disastrous to believe everything we read in the Sunday newspapers and to assume that Westland is anything other than an extremely prosperous company. It is true that the company did not make a profit last year, but neither did many other helicopter companies worldwide. There is a huge surplus of helicopters on the world market—the French are virtually giving them away and the Americans cannot sell theirs. This naturally means that Westland is facing a temporary recession.

I cannot believe that there is a thought going through Ministers' minds that they should not keep Westland Helicopters in business. It is vital that we have our own domestic helicopter producer, not just for employment and technology reasons but for strategic reasons. I was privileged to be in the Ministry of Defence during the Falklands war, and I know the work that was put in at short notice to ensure that the various modifications necessary for operating in that specific circumstance were fulfilled in a way that I do not believe any foreign supplier could have done. I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence will ensure that there is sufficient work to keep Westland in business.

If the Government are to have a helicopter system between the time when the Wessex and Puma helicopters are phased out and the time when the NH90 comes into operation, they must act. I believe, from my limited observation of the Concorde and the helicopter co-operative programmes, that the concept of four countries co-operating to make a new type of helicopter before the end of this century is unrealistic. The order for the 85 or so W30s that are required will be a huge shot in the arm for Westland. They will be an extremely important acquisition for our services. I cannot believe, when the cost of the W30 is 30 per cent. less than the cost of the American contender and 45 per cent. less than the cost of the French contender, that any Conservative Government could decide other than to go for the W30. I shall not spell out the huge number of jobs that would be involved. Those jobs would be important to my constituency, to the constituency of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and to the whole of the aviation industry. I hope that my right hon. Friend will soon say that the W30 will move from being an air staff target to being an air staff requirement. I hope that this spring the Government will be firm in what they propose.

I am conscious of the time limit. I should like to go into the arguments about spending on helicopters within the whole of the Ministry of Defence. I believe that the helicopter is a much underrated asset on the modern battlefield and that the Americans have begun to understand that. In the United States there are 14 helicopters for every 1,000 soldiers while in the United Kingdom the figure is 2·7 per thousand. If we had had more helicopters during the Falklands war, the war could have been conducted more efficiently and could have been concluded faster. I well remember the cost of losing the Atlantic Conveyor when the Chinooks went down with her.

My right hon. Friend the Minister includes the Meteorological Office in his responsibilities. I suggest that he should spend a good deal of time seeing what happens in that organisation. Between 1979 and 1985 the cost to the civil aviation industry of meteorological information increased by 225 per cent. It costs £100 to provide the meteorological information necessary for the shuttle to fly between London and Glasgow. For every major aircraft on the United Kingdom register, the airlines have to pay £40,000 a year in meteorological charges. I do not think that I have to persuade the public about the Meteorological Office, because when I was responsible for answering for its activities, my assurances that the office was doing a good job were guaranteed to make hon. Members shriek with laughter. It is time something was done about the Meteorological Office. If necessary, we should privatise it, but we should not go on spending £50 million or more a year on it, at vast cost to the British taxpayer who does not trust the stuff that comes out of it.

7.17 pm

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Minister of State said that the RAF is in the middle of a large re-equipment programme. The RAF is undergoing the most extensive modernisation programme for 20 years, involving the expenditure of £14 billion on major projects in the coming decade. I shall examine some of those projects and then, in the light of the emerging technology which some of those projects reflect, assess the possibility of our armed forces, including the Royal Air Force, placing less reliance on nuclear arms.

According to paragraph 4.10 of the 1984 defence statement,

"Later this year, the Tornado F2 will join the RAF and crew training for the operational conversion unit at RAF Coningsby will begin."

In opening the debate a year ago, the former Minister of State for Defence Procurement said that the Tornado F2 would be introduced into service in 1985. I should have liked the Minister of State for the Armed Forces in his opening references to that programme to have been a little more specific. The right hon. Gentleman was more specific on UKADGE, the United Kingdom air defence ground environment. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that it was being completely replaced, but, along with JTIDS, completion is not expected before the late 1980s. That is disturbing news for hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Three squadrons of Tornado GR1—the strike-attack variant—have now been formed in the United Kingdom, and their introduction into RAF Germany in place of the Buccaneer and Jaguar has begun. Is there any foundation for the suggestion that problems attend the introduction of the GR1 in RAF Germany? The Comptroller and Auditor-General stated in a report in November 1984 that the Tornado collaborative project had "developed a substantial work-sharing imbalance that was losing Britain defence work worth as much as £250 million."

I should like the Minister to comment on that.

The Minister mentioned the AV8B — GR5, a development of the original Harrier. Its avionics will include equipment, principally a forward-looking infra red, known as FLIR, which will give the aircraft a night attack capability. I understand that the United States and the United Kingdom night attack requirements are similar and that the possibility of a collaborative FLIR programme is under consideration. I think that the House would have liked the Minister to say a word about progress on that.

I understand that two firms—the dynamics group of British Aerospace and GEC Avionics—are competing to supply a FLIR system to meet the United Kingdom requirements and that the successful contractor will be selected in 1985. The House is looking to the Minister for comment on that also.

On the survivability of priority one airfields in the United Kingdom and RAF Germany, we are looking for a progress report—preferably tonight. That leads us to the Rapier air defence missile system which, as we know from Falklands experience, is indispensable to the survivability of our airfields. Until the tracked Rapier is fully deployed, will not air defence be inadequate?

In the debate a year ago, I questioned whether the ASRAAM programme was safe. The Tornado 2 will enter service with its Skyflash and Sidewinder missiles. In the early 1990s, we plan to replace them with a new generation AMRAAM and ASRAAM, on which we are working with our American and German allies. The Minister will be aware of my fear that the United States will compete for ASRAAM and that it is, in fact, preparing to take over both programmes.

The Minister will recall my concern that the Government should move beyond the stage of studies into air-launched systems or stand-off weapons for Tornado. With the look-down, shoot-down capability of the Soviet air force and its airborne early warning, and given the dramatic modernisation of the Soviet air force—which the Minister a year ago described as Warsaw pact air superiority—Tornado may not be able to get over the target by the late 1980s, but will have to engage it from a distance.

The defence statement of 1983, paragraph 4, claimed that studies were in hand to assess the conventional armed long-range stand-off missile or complementary systems to manned aircraft. Of course, Tornado was in mind. However, there is no mention of that in the 1984 defence statement. I believe that a memorandum of understanding with the United States on two new programmes—the long-range stand-off missile and the short-range anti-radiation missile—are in hand. Again, I look to the Minister to comment on progress.

I understand that on a visit to RAF Finningley in 1979, the Prime Minister pledged that service men's pay would match that of their civilian counterparts. We all endorse the Minister's closing remarks when he paid tribute to the men of the RAF. Therefore, I am bound to ask whether the pay review body is being guided by that principle of parity with civilian counterparts.

There is general consensus in most west European countries that it is desirable to lessen NATO's reliance on nuclear weapons. To assess more adequately how much is enough to reduce reliance on nuclear weapons, it is first necessary to arrive at a consensus on what is meant by the nuclear threshold and what level of nuclear dependence political authorities and publics within the Alliance are prepared to accept.

Of all the various measures for raising the nuclear threshold—that is, for improving conventional defence—one merits special attention because it has received more attention within the Alliance during the past year than any other, and that is sustainability. Lack of adequate sustainability within the NATO forces is, according to Saceur General Rogers, the most serious military deficiency facing the Alliance. NATO guidelines call for 30 days of war stocks — for example, ammunition, petrol and spare parts—all of which apply to the RAF. Yet most countries' war stocks fall well below that level. Therefore, how can any of them claim that they are keeping in touch with public opinion and its increasing sensitivity about the present reliance on nuclear weapons? They are not putting in hand the improvement of conventional forces which would have the effect of raising the nuclear threshold.

creates difficulties for him. We recognise how he will be tempted to delay decisions to a future date when he will have more room for manoeuvre.

However, I caution the Minister, in case he considers delay a mechanism for solving his problems, that the consequences are severe. The RAF needs will remain unmet in the key area of our defence. That will inevitably push the replacement helicopter into a position where it clashes with other capital programmes. Delay will weaken our capacity for export from Westland and other British industries. Westland will not have the bridge to secure itself a future position. It will be tied into the NH90 collaborative helicopter in a weaker position than would otherwise be the case.

If the Secretary of State cannot commit himself to a date, we shall be disappointed, although we shall understand why. If only he would commit the Government to choosing the W-30 on principle, we can, perhaps, live with uncertainty about the date, because we shall at least have one foot on the ground and something that we can use to encourage exports. With that, Westland's hand will be strengthened for exports.

The Secretary of State realises that he is dealing, not with a weak company, but with one whose work force and management have shown themselves capable of taking courageous and tough decisions to enable them to survive in an increasingly competitive market place. The Secretary of State is dealing not with an ailing industrial sector, but with a world sector with an assured growth for the future. He is not dealing with a company that has no future orders. On the contrary, the company has an assured future in the EH101, which is the greatest single helicopter project in which the company has taken part. He is dealing not with a company that cannot supply the essential needs of the RAF less expensively than others, but with a company which can supply a British buy from a proven record. We know from the experience in the Falklands that it can supply the goods—and, in this case, supply them at a cost 30 per cent. less than its competitors.

In asking the Minister for a decision now or soon, Westland is not seeking charity. It has no need of that. It does not want gifts or handouts. It wants the Government to make a decision so that it can plan its future, get on with the job, and do the thing that it knows best—building the best helicopters in the world for the RAF's needs.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): There is a lot that I want to get through and in view of the time limit, I hope that I do not gabble too much. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) about the sale of Tornados to Turkey. We are talking about £1 billion of export orders. I thought that Farnborough existed to deal with our defence sales among other matters. I can do no better than to quote from a letter I sent to the Prime Minister. I said:

"As you have indicated on many occasions, the British aerospace industry is a shining example to the rest of the country in its design, production, marketing, delivery, profits, workforce and general management. Is it to suffer at the hands of the Governments of France, U.S.A., and others, in that they bend over backwards to support their aerospace industry in competitive foreign sales, or can they be assured of the necessary financial assistance equivalent to the predatory financing being offered elsewhere? Is it to lose out to the Mirage 2000 taking up sales which should be Tornados or E.F.A.'s or even a national version of a new fighter, breaking up design teams and the backs of many sub-contractors, or can the situation be retrieved as a matter of urgency?"

Hon. Members will not be surprised to learn that I want to talk largely about the European fighter aircraft. It has been the subject of a continuing saga under various mnemonics and titles since I was elected in 1979. There will soon be a meeting — it causes me and my constituents some anxiety — to discuss the feasibility plan, development and production of the EFA for 1985 onwards. I was sufficiently worried about it to raise the matter with the Secretary of State in the House. He recently wrote me a letter and confirmed that there may have been

"a slippage of perhaps 4 weeks on the timescale we had in mind last summer. We realise however that a further period will be needed for officials to assess the results of the studies, for the Air Staffs to consider the capability offered, for National Armaments Directors to prepare the ground for a Ministerial Meeting and for us to take a view on the military, financial and industrial aspects."

As I predicted, and said earlier in an intervention, France is at the nub of the argument. A French industry spokesman said:

"It is important to join forces with the UK, not because of the physics but because of the money required for development."

However, Emile Blanc, the national French armaments director said:

"We are taking steps to ensure that France controls technology in areas where we lead other nations."

I have a document from the company, for whom I seek to speak because of my constituency interest. It states:

"British aerospace industries would prefer a national solution to the new fighter requirement."

The company believes that it will be at no extra cost to the percentage of the United Kingdom collaboration, which is proposed within EFA because of the great cost of the French aviation industry, to which I also referred in an intervention. The document states:

"British aerospace industries would prefer a national solution to the new fighter requirement for the RAF in view of the greater opportunity to utilise the industries resources and technology, as developed by the EAP with the substantial industrial involvement in that programme.

However, they recognise the value of a major collaborative programme with the enlarged overall programme and long term stability which would ensue, and consequently have co-operated fully in the five nation feasibility study for the EFA which has just been submitted to the five Governments.

In any programme which hopefully will follow on from these studies they would expect the following aspects to be respected by HMG to safeguard the UK national position and the continuing viability of the aerospace industry.

1. The weapon system resulting from the programme must meet the minimum operational target of the RAF.
2. There must be equality of worksharing with GE and FR during the development phase, recognising that subsequent adjustments can be made in production to reflect the numbers of aircraft bought by each nation.
3. Workshare arrangements should apply separately to airframe, engine, and equipments.
4. There should be equality of management authority and responsibility between the five nations with no overt leadership by one nation for either airframe or engine.
5. A central NATO agency should be established with authority to place contract on the industries.
6. To ensure maximum penetration of the export market it is necessary to get aircraft into service as soon as possible and no later than January 1995."

Anything that does not meet those criteria will be wholly unacceptable to the company, management and work force, to the British aerospace industry and to those of my constituents who work in it. It will also be wholly unacceptable to me. I make my position quite clear. I can do no better than to quote from some of the recent remarks made about this project in various trade journals. For example, the national aerospace organiser for TASS says:

"We don't seem to know what we are doing or where we are going; that's bad for Britain's defence. Tass is concerned that the UK will come out 'the worst' from any negotiations because there appears to be an absence of policy as to what we want".

The editorial in Flight International, the United Kingdom magazine on aviation, says:

"Neither German nor British governments have shown a willingness to put even their own nation's interest first, and departmental pride is allowed to inhibit possible spending . . . France has also taken an export-led stance, and geared the development of new aircraft to the potential export market, without allowing that consideration to govern France's own military requirements."

Dornier and Northrop are continuing to work on the ND-102 project as a fall-back position, because, as the vice-president and chief designer of Northrop said:

"We think there is enough chance [that the EFA program will fail] that we want to continue to be prepared for the opportunity if it comes."

Aviation Week and Space Technology, the leading American magazine, says:

"U.S. government officials contemplating the difficulties are convinced the entire program will never get off the ground. The skeptics at this point have a reasonable bet."

That shows the concern that has been expressed about the EFA project. The importance of the project cannot be underestimated. I know what the former Minister of State for Defence Procurement did, what my hon. Friend the Minister is doing—as he has a constituency interest—and, above all, what the Secretary of State is doing. but the industry's perception is that the French are outmanoeuvring us. They have indicated that Dassault wants 46 per cent. of the airframe. People at all levels of industry tell me that the French are getting away with murder. I am not prepared to tolerate it any longer. I am fed up with urging the project and with apparently not getting very far. The Government and the industry together must get a grip to ensure that that plane gets off the ground. If we cannot get a collaborative project, which is what we all want, we must have a national project.

The situation in relation to jobs, technical expertise, the world leadership on offer within the British aerospace industries, and in relation to the strategic and industrial requirements demands that that project goes ahead now. It must not be delayed any longer. I, the Royal Air Force, hon. Members generally and, above all, the British aerospace industry, including my constituents, demand that it should happen now. I hope that the Government and the House will recognise the urgency of the project.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I shall return later to the challenging points made by the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), as I agreed with everything that he said. I do not always agree with him, but on this occasion I agreed with him in toto.

The Minister made some very unfortunate remarks in his opening statement. He referred to Phantoms bought from the United States, modified Hawks, updated Buccaneers, stretched aircraft, reborne Shackletons and reincarnated Jet Provosts. In many ways he reminded me of Ron Moody when he appeared in the film musical of "Oliver Twist". Even though I am a Welshman, I shall not sing, but the phrase that I have in mind is:

"We are reviewing the situation".

That is about all that the Government do. If reviews were aircraft, the RAF would be well off. But, in effect, the Department sits back and fails to make any decisions. If the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) had been in the Chamber I think that he would have agreed with my next point. After all, I wonder what would have happened if Mitchell had not built the Spitfire or its prototype for the Schneider trophy, possibly even before the Minister was born. We did not have enough Spitfires in 1939, but at least we had them. In 1995 will there be any aircraft, or will there be just another review?

I should be delighted to see the Secretary of State in a flak jacket standing by an advanced fighter ready for 1995. But I believe that we are standing in the shadow of Trident. It is influencing events and preventing decisions from being made. I need not rehearse the points made by the hon. Member for South Ribble, because he spoke well on behalf of his constituents and the industry. I commend him on that and I agree with everything that he said. It is about time that the Department made a decision.

There was an interesting development this week. Some hon. Members will know that I have been fighting a battle to get the Super 748 over to the Caribbean. But I believe that that decision was bedevilled by a Frenchman, who was a Commissioner. I had a fascinating reply from the Prime Minister this week, indicating that she intends to find out exactly what went wrong with that deal. The 10 nations wanted it, the airline wanted it, the bank wanted it but the French said no.

As the hon. Member for South Ribble has said, it is about time the French were told that they should either be a partner, and an equal partner at that, or should let us go alone. This is no time for being mealy-mouthed, and there is no point in dressing up and being photographed. This is the time for action. The French must be told that if they want the European fighter, they must collaborate on a fair basis, with the Brits being allowed to maintain their technology and work force as well.

Let us consider this renovated Jet Provost, Pilatus or Tucano. Why do we not return to the simple concept of letting the RAF choose its own aircraft? It is the RAF that flies them, and not the Minister or the Secretary of State. The RAF knows its requirements. When I was in the RAF, I was given a very good aircraft. I was very grateful to the manufacturers. I had a Mosquito, the best 'plane of its day. The Secretary of State has a duty to ensure that the skilled members of the RAF have the best aircraft available for training as well as operational purposes. That is his prime duty. There should be no more reviews, dilly-dallying or finger trouble. I am reminded of old Pilot Officer Prune who was given an award for failing to do things on time. He was awarded the Highly Derogatory Order of the Irremovable Finger. The Minister must ensure that he is not given that order. I shall certainly present him with it, if he does not make the right decision. I am sure that hon. Members will associate themselves with my comments.

I turn to Woodford and to the importance of maintaining a skilled work force. It is the last place in the United Kingdom where a large-scale military aircraft can be built. There is no point in the Secretary of State using one of his favourite terms—"It's front loading." That is rubbish. If we are to sustain a large aircraft building capability, Woodford must be supported.

I shall obtain favour all round tonight, because I now turn to the subject of helicopters. It must be the W-30. We must maintain the helicopter capability in this country. It is sometimes assumed that the west country is an area of full employment, but is not. The work force can build the aircraft or helicopter that is desired, and that will at the same time provide employment, and sustain and maintain the technology that we need in this country.

The Minister spoke about the search and rescue scheme, but there is something else that the RAF could do with its helicopters. It could involve itself more and more in perinatal care and in the new-born baby. The RAF could help to take babies to special units quickly. That is humane work and requires skilled training.

I have been speaking of conventional defence. Some of the delays have been occasioned by the awesome burden of Trident. I believe that implicitly.

The Minister must ensure that the RAF gets its preferred aircraft. The overwhelming need is to sustain British technology in the aircraft industry. The Minister must preserve the skills and initiatives of the work force. No more reviews. Action, please.

8.1 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In many ways the debate has been untypical. Usually in debates on the Royal Air Force we discuss the depth of pile in the carpets at RAF Germany and whether English programmes are shown on television there. Constituency pre-occupations have not dominated this debate. That is to the good.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State set the right tone when he concentrated on the operational capabilities of the service and its equipment. I want to take the debate into the future—into the next century and beyond. This is the appropriate time to do so.

This month two leading representatives of our European Alliance have spoken about the significance of President Reagan's strategic defence initiative, launched in his famous speech on 23 March 1983. Chancellor Kohl in his Wehrkunde speech at Munich and our Prime Minister in her speech yesterday to both Houses of Congress welcomed the idea of European industry participating in the research programme.

I should like to examine how the strategic defence initiative and the new technologies for the military utilisation of space will affect RAF strategies, its order of battle, procurement policy and manpower planning. The most important element concerns the men and women of the RAF.

Lord Trenchard was one of the greatest men of our century in terms of the work that he did towards the creation of an independent Royal Air Force and for building a structure which would endure. That structure endured through the second world war and proved itself in that conflict. Basically it endured until the late 1950s and early 1960s. In the 1950s the flying squadrons of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force were disbanded and in the 1960s changes were made in the training of officers. They were profound alterations from the old Trenchardian mould.

For the next century we must attract people who will be capable of servicing and manning the space-based systems that will ensure our deterrents, and our defence. For that we need a new tri-service cadet college to train people in the appropriate military sciences. I have always said that the place to do so should be at Greenwich and that when cadets have completed their training there they should go on to their respective academies and that for the Air Force it should be Cranwell. At present Cranwell courses are short and not appropriate to the future scientific and professional training required. The United States Air Force academy has a course lasting four years and is of the highest calibre.

I do not wish to decry the role of graduates from our universities and colleges. They will continue to be essential, but we need a new, highly professional, properly trained stream of permanent commissioned entrants.

In mid-career we must enhance the role of the college of air warfare at Cranwell. It already provides an astronautics course. We should carry it further so that the course ultimately involves space experience. We should approach the task in co-operation with our European allies.

We and our European allies must co-ordinate our whole approach to the strategic defence initiative. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has shown the way forwrd in his industrial approach. We must resolve our military role. First, we shall have to deploy in Europe point defence systems against ballistic missile attack. There is nothing new in the concept of protecting from pre-emptive or first strike our own deterrent forces and our centres of population. We did it in the 1950s and 1960s when Fighter Command protected the bomber bases of the V force. The point defence systems will be the easiest component of the SDI to evolve and I believe that they will be the first to be deployed.

More futuristic elements are involved also. I refer to the means of intercepting ballistic missiles in their boost, post-boost and mid-course elements of flight. Those aspects of SDI will require space-based systems. Some could be manned, but certainly they will have to be serviced and maintained. The shuttle has shown that this is possible. It is already possible to retrieve, maintain and repair satellites in space. The Royal Air Force and its personnel will have a role in that.

We must examine too how we are to deny to a potential enemy the eyes and the ears that control military operations. Increasingly those eyes and ears are satellites. The Soviets have already deployed a rudimentary first generation anti-satellite system. They are keen that the United States should not fully develop and deploy their own anti-satellite system. I have no doubt that the Americans will pursue its development—and they will be right to do so. I hope that the system will be operational shortly with the F-15.

The ability to intercept and destroy satellites will not be unique to the American component of our Alliance. We Europeans will have a similar requirement. I hope that the air staffs of our respective countries are addressing themselves to the problem already. I believe that the Tornado F-2 and, ultimately, the European fighter aircraft will be the appropriate launch vehicles for such a system. Command and control operations will also be required. That will be costly and is another matter which must be addressed.

We have dealt with today's problems, the problems of the 1980s and we have looked to the 1990s. There is no doubt that in the next century the RAF will have a spatial role. I hope that is so. The motto of the service is not "per ardua ad caelum" but "per ardua ad astra". In that spirit I hope that the Secretary of State and his colleagues will encourage the Service and Civil Service to examine the changes required within the RAF to meet the challenges of the space age.

I hope that the strategic defence initiative, which has undoubtedly brought the Soviets to the negotiating table again and which offers some hope that the pattern of mutually assured destruction will be broken, will mean that there will be greater security for our peoples. I trust that we shall play our full part in this process and that the RAF will play a leading role.

8.9 pm

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): As the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said, this is a strange debate in some ways as hon. Members with such diverse views as the hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) apparently agree and almost feel mutual admiration. I hope that the Minister is aware of the pressures that might be being applied.

I shall confine my speech to the urgent need to provide the RAF with a new trainer. I trust that the Minister was not being serious when he suggested the refurbishment of the present trainer as a credible alternative. I hope that the laughter that went around the Chamber when he said that was not nervous laughter, but a sign that the House has discounted such an alternative.

I speak on behalf of all hon. Members from Ayrshire, except the Secretary of State for Scotland, when I say that there is only one aircraft that should be the replacement for the trainer—the British Aerospace PC9. In a debate such as this, there is a danger of overstating the case, so I shall not go into detail about its technical qualities. I do not wish to denigrate other aircraft as, in their way, they are all first-rate, but the PC9 shines out like a throughbred.

An important feature of the PC9 is that it meets all of the RAF's requirements. The Minister and others have paid respect to the skill of the RAF. They should seriously consider giving the RAF the airplane aeroplane that it wants. The PC9 can meet the required specifications with minimal changes whereas its competitors are apparently having some difficulty. Why are there delays? Some of us suspect that the PC9's competitors are being given extra time to reach the specifications required.

Moreover, the PC9 is the best industrial solution. Several hon. Members have spoken of the influence on their constituency if the PC9 were chosen. I have a constituency interest in it. Although Prestwick is not in my constituency—it is 11 miles away in the constituency of the Secretary of State for Scotland — engineers and aircraft fitters based at Prestwick live throughout Ayrshire. In the initial stages, the PC9 can provide 150 jobs where the average rate of male unemployment is about 22 per cent. That number could be extended to 250. That is important to an area that has just lost a British Steel Corporation foundry with the loss of 280 jobs.

Despite the claims of its competitors, the PC9's airframe is 85 per cent. British and I understand that about 90 per cent. of the technical equipment is British. The Minister must consider all of the factors which make up the equation, but the RAF has said that it wants the PC9, it will provide about 2,400 jobs for British industry, it is almost wholly British-built and it would provide jobs throughout the United Kingdom. The best craftsmen in the world will be employed in building it. I would be astonished if the PC9 was not chosen.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): I agree with everything that the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) said about the PC9. It might surprise him that my constituents have an interest in it as Ferranti is involved.

It would be churlish if I did not say that I spoke in the House last year arguing that Ferranti should get a contract for the GR5 Harrier. In the past few days, my right hon. Friend the Minister has awarded that contract. The significance of it is the relationship with the European fighter — because Ferranti will now be in a much stronger position to compete for the avionics of that fighter. Recognition of the work of Ferranti as a world leader has been enormously strengthened by my right hon. Friend's decision, for which I thank him very much.

My right hon. Friend the Minister said that he hoped that collaboration will succeed, but there are serious potential difficulties with France. I understand that the British aerospace industries want a partnership that involves equality of work-sharing and of management authority. During discussions, France might prove to be less genuinely interested in that policy than us. I appreciate that Minister Hernu might do his best to deliver, but the power of the French industrial and trade union lobbies, especially in regard to the Dassault company, are so powerful that the French will be unlikely to accept a genuine partnership.

I hope that my right hon. Friend is right to think that collaboration will succeed but, in the event of it being difficult to get a genuine partnership, I hope that he will have readily available an alternative policy and plan for a national solution to preserve the structure and capability of the British aerospace industry. "Jane's All the World's Aircraft 1984-85" said recently of the European fighter:

> "With the first flight scheduled for the far future of 1990-91, there are many people, notably in the USA, who expect it to be abandoned long before then, in the case of five-nation failure to compromise."

I applaud my right hon. Friend's will to make it succeed but I hope that he will be prepared if the worst comes to the worst.

On the PC9, the argument advanced earlier that the view of the Royal Air Force should prevail carries weight. The employment arguments are relatively evenly balanced, although we look forward to hearing the arguments to be put forward by hon. Members from Northern Ireland. Obviously it would lead to more employment in Northern Ireland but by the same token it would probably lead, over the years, to less employment in British Aerospace.

I believe that what the RAF want is the argument which should carry most weight, but I do not wish to conceal from the House that I have an interest in the matter. In the past I have, as an author, written about Prestwick. Moreover, when my father was a Member of Parliament for a Scottish constituency he helped to found Prestwick and the Scottish aviation industry. It began as a very modest project. However, after a series of mergers it became the Scottish division of British Aerospace.

As it nears its 40th anniversary I hope the House will forgive me if I say that there could be no stronger recognition of and encouragement to the work force at Prestwick than if Prestwick obtained this order. It would reinforce the belief of the work force that it has a continuing and permanent contribution to make to the industry as the headquarters of the Scottish aviation industry, and that is no more than the RAF deserves and desires.

Finally, I wish to refer to the restoration of the flying role of the auxiliary air force. It could have either a search and rescue role, or a training capacity or be used as reinforcement. It would be very good for morale if those who have served for many years in the Royal Air Force, who have developed considerable expertise and who wish to retain a connection with the RAF could play such a role in the auxiliary air force. As and when economic circumstances permit, I hope that the Minister will accede to that request.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Owing to the splendid co-operation of hon. Members, there is no longer any need for me to enforce the 10-minute limit upon speeches. Nevertheless, I still appeal for brief contributions.

8.21 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): May I place on record the admiration and appreciation of the Ulster Unionists for the excellent service given by the men and women of the Royal Air Force, both nationally and internationally. The Ulster Unionists believe that the RAF should be provided with the best basic trainer that is available for training its pilots. The Government are aware of the importance of job creation and we would be pleased if such a project were to come to Northern Ireland. I recognise that a very fine balance has to be drawn and that there is an equal need for jobs to be created at the Shorts factory in Belfast and on the mainland. However, such a decision must not be made simply on social grounds. If that were the case, I believe that Northern Ireland would outstrip all contenders. Unemployment in Northern Ireland stands at 21 per cent., with 50 per cent. male unemployment in some areas.

My duty as the Ulster Unionist spokesman on trade and industry is to draw to the attention of the House what I believe to be a scandalous attempt by British Aerospace to force the so-called merits of its aircraft upon all and sundry, not only by means of an expensive and continuous campaign in the national press but also by means of an organised invasion of this House through The House Magazine.

Mr. Stephen Ross: I cannot allow that remark to pass unnoticed. I wrote to the chairman of Shorts congratulating him upon his campaign. I even received a Christmas card from him with a Tucano on it. I think that the Shorts campaign has been magnificent.

Mr. Beggs: I thank the hon. Gentleman for such a tribute. However, those hon. Members who have listened to the whole debate will probably have come to the conclusion that I am the lone ranger in this exercise. The strength of the case presented by Shorts has contributed to the recognition paid to it by English, Scottish and Welsh hon. Members who support the Shorts motion. I question whether it is right that a company which is 48 per cent. funded by the public should spend such vast sums of money upon advertisements in the national press.

Those who live in Northern Ireland know only too well the true value of money. We should prefer to pitch performance and price against publicity and pressure. We do not believe that ideological considerations should prevail when a decision is finally made. However, on performance and price we are prepared to accept the outcome. I believe that the methods used by British Aerospace in its efforts to win this contract are quite obnoxious. An attempt has been made to misrepresent the qualities of other aircraft. Unfortunately some, though not all, hon. Members have swallowed some of the information that has been peddled. However, I am confident that such unworthy tactics will not influence right hon. and hon. Members and that they will not be fooled.

Mr. McKelvey: The hon. Gentleman's remarks about British Aerospace are not true. If I had to condemn the management of British Aerospace I should say that it has lagged sadly behind Shorts, vis-à-vis Shorts' Tucano. There has been consistent and persistent lobbying from the trade union movement.

Mr. Beggs: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. It is quite right and proper that on behalf of their members in British Aerospace factories the trade unions should make representations to those hon. Members who represent constituency interests. However, I am in a unique position. I do not have a constituency interest to put forward. When we apply the rather scarce commodity, truth, to the debate we find out why the advertising campaign by British Aerospace is necessary. In the best and final offer stage, Short Brothers produced a package which shines through the smokescreen thrown up by British Aerospace.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): My hon. Friend has referred to a smokescreen. Could that be due in part to the fact that the new Garrett engine that is expected to be fitted to the Tucano is equal, if not better in terms of speed and rate of climb, to the PC9?

Mr. Beggs: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention, but since we are discussing truth I do not intend to exaggerate. All I would say is that the Shorts Tucano has always met the requirements of the Royal Air Force, even when it appeared that the specifications had been increased. Indeed, the Garrett engine performs in every sense up to the level of the PC9. I said that I would not boast but the facts are there for all those who are responsible for examining the details to see. However, when the running costs are considered, the Shorts Tucano has cheaper running costs than its main rival. The life cycle costs of the Tucano are substantially lower than those of the PC9. There is a further bonus in the fact that spares for the Tucano are much cheaper than those for its main rival.

Claims that only one aircraft fully meets the RAF performance requirements for its new basic trainer are simply not true; nor is the suggestion that employment created by the PC9 will be greater than that created by its competitors. As for the claims for a perfect marriage between the Hawk and the PC9, I believe that hon. Members and the British taxpayer will be more influenced by and interested in the facts than in such speculative romance.

Almost everyone is agreed about the need for a new basic trainer, and the decision will be taken by the Ministry of Defence on the basis of the facts as they are known by the Ministry, without any element of favour.

The reaching of a decision is not assisted by the spectacle of mass national press advertising, especially when the claims made by British Aerospace for its aircraft and its uniqueness cannot be factually supported.

Shorts has based its campaign on the well-proven principle of offering a better product at a more competitive price overall. The decision will be made by the Ministry of Defence on the basis of the facts. It is regrettable that the issue has been confused by claims made by British Aerospace which have no foundation in fact.

The most important matter of all is that the RAF should be supplied as soon as possible with a modern basic trainer which meets all aspects of technical requirements and specifications which it has put forward. Shorts' Tucano meets all performance requirements. There is clear evidence of long fatigue life. Short Brothers has the industrial capability to deliver a first-class product on schedule. Shorts' Tucano has competitive first-cost and low life-cycle costs. It combines maximum United Kingdom content with the greatest United Kingdom job creation potential. It is right for the RAF, it is right for the United Kingdom, and the time is right for a decision by Government in favour of the Shorts Tucano as a basic trainer for the RAF.

8.33 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My speech this evening must begin on a note of great sadness, because my constituent, Junior Technician Colin Wilson, just shortly after his 22nd birthday, was one of the young RAF bandsmen who so tragically were killed recently in Germany. I pay tribute to the courage, camaraderie and expertise of our RAF bandsmen. We hold them in the highest regard, and I know that the whole House will wish to share my expression of sympathy to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson of Holyhead.

My constituency is the home of RAF Valley, where all our fast jet pilots are trained. The station makes a valuable contribution to our island's economy, and none can be busier than the station's search and rescue and mountain rescue teams, which are kept fully occupied by accidents on Snowdonia. My right hon. Friend paid tribute to them in his speech.

The young pilots at RAF Valley have a great interest in which aircraft will be the next RAF basic trainer. The speeches by hon. Members on behalf of their constituents are commendable. British Aerospace has a strong lobby. I propose for a few moments to indulge in some special pleading, but I do not have a constituency interest, so I hope that hon. Members will accept that in my comments I can be regarded as being disinterested.

I might say, perhaps with a note of detached amusement, that the speeches for the Pilatus PC9 and for the Tucano would probably have cancelled each other out if one were conducting the debate on the basis of some sort of competition, but during a period in which there has been the most intensive lobbying for any new military project it appears that there has been a change of emphasis in the Government's interpretation of the specification.

Originally, the clear impression was conveyed that there was no point in or advantage to be gained by any contender for the project seeking to produce an aircraft much better than AST412. Now, however, the goalposts seem to have been moved, and it appears that encouragement is being given to those who have exceeded the requirements of AST412. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, when he replies, will make clear what is the order of the day. In any event, can my hon. Friend deny that the Hunting Firecracker's performance is well in excess of AST412 and can be equated with Swiss Pilatus? It is extraordinary that there is a debate as to which aircraft is best for Britain. Only the Hunting Firecracker is of total British design and can offer jobs in the long term on the back of export orders.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Can my hon. Friend tell me what proportion of the components of the Firecracker are British?

Mr. Best: A very large proportion indeed. I do not wish to go down that route or to argue whether there is one percentage point more British components in one aircraft than in another, but I can tell my hon. Friend that it is a very large percentage. It does not derogate, in any event, from my statement that the Hunting Firecracker is of British design. If my hon. Friend will bear with me, I shall seek to persuade him of my point of view. Being the reasonable man that he is, no doubt he will be persuaded by the force of the argument.

It is only the Hunting Firecracker that can offer jobs in the long term on the back of export orders. I have never understood the argument that buying a foreign product is better for Britain when there is a British alternative. If there were to be a decision in favour of the Swiss Pilatus, backed by British Aerospace, we may smell the sweet breath of the Treasury down the back of my right hon. Friend, perhaps more with the thought of boosting the quotation of British Aerospace shares in a few months' time than with the thought of what is the best aircraft for Britain. I hope I am wrong, but that is a thought.

Is there any connection between the Government's interest in the Brazilian Tucano, built by Shorts, as it would be, and privatisation of the company? That is another question that it is perhaps proper to ask.

Mr. Wilkinson: I hesitate to say so, but I have flown all three aeroplanes, and on the basis of that experience I would not presume to make any suggestion; it is for the air staff to decide. Should not we say that the air staff should be allowed to have the aeroplane that they want and select?

While my hon. Friend is talking about other aeroplanes than the Firecracker being foreign, does he not remember that one of the best RAF trainers ever was the North American Texan or Harvard?

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend has a great deal of expertise and knowledge in these matters and the advantage over practically every hon. Member of having flown the aircraft concerned, and many other aircraft as well. I would not seek to cross swords with him as to his view of the aircraft. Although it is important that due weight should be given to the air staff's desire for an aircraft, I know that my hon. Friend, having been in the RAF himself, will no doubt be the first to agree that the air staff will go for the aircraft which they think is the best. It may be the most expensive, because the two are very often synonymous. That may not necessarily be in the best interests of this country. I know that my hon. Friend would not pursue that argument to its logical conclusion — that every piece of procurement should be done on the basis of precisely what the particular service demands at the time. But I accept the important point that he makes, that due weight should be given to the air staff's desire and expression of preference.

[Mr. Best]

Is it the Ministry of Defence or the Treasury that will make the decision on procurement for our armed forces? If it is the latter, perhaps we do not need the former and can make substantial departmental staff savings — I speak in jest and do not propose that seriously. The House should have regard to whether some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) in his intervention about the preferences of the air staff, the question of employment and what is best for this country will be uppermost in the Government's consideration when making the decision, or whether the decision will be based entirely on finance. Although I appreciate the need for economy, I should certainly be very unhappy if the defence of the realm were to be based entirely on what was the cheapest product going at the time.

Are we to be led by the nose by foreign competitors subsidised by foreign Governments, in one case with money borrowed on the international market which is unlikely ever to be paid? Can it be right to see the extra marketing in the world of a foreign aircraft which has been given the boost of endorsement by the Royal Air Force?

Hunting Firecracker would make no profit whatsoever on this project, but would seek to make its profit on future export sales, on which, of course, the Government would get a royalty, which they would certainly not receive on a foreign aircraft. There is no guarantee whatever that we would sell Hawk on the back of a Swiss deal, and even Pilatus is convinced that any such thing is at least five years in the future.

Hunting Firecracker is competing with aircraft subsidised by foreign Governments to be produced by Government-funded industries. It does not sound like the actions of this Conservative Government. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on what has been achieved so far by the Government for the Royal Air Force. I believe that it is a verifiable manifestation of our commitment to the first duty of Government—the defence of the realm. I can only ask my right hon. Friend to fight for his Department and for his Department's right to make the decision on the RAF trainer, not that of the Treasury, and to fight for the best interests of Britain and the RAF, which is in the forefront of the defence system.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): There is an obligation on all of us to be succinct.

Refuelling crews—and I agree with the Minister on this—do a fantastic job on the airbridge. These guys work at the margin of safety and it is a tribute to their skill that a Hercules has not yet gone into the drink. The skill of the air-to-air refuelling pilots and personnel is so great and the job is so hairy that a tribute must be paid to those who carry it out.

I wish to concentrate on the airbridge and on Mount Pleasant and ask a number of precise questions which are probably best answered by letter rather than in the debate.

My first question is this. I understand that the Argentine air force has taken delivery of the Durandel anti-runway bomb which is made by Matra in France—and which is purchased in some quantity, incidentally, by the United States air force. Unfortunately, it can be delivered by small aeroplanes like the Skyhawk, which can take up to 10 Durandels. It can be dropped at low altitude and we cannot be certain that every plane would be engaged by Rapier.

I understand that when the Durandel is released a parachute opens to slow the bomb, creating a safe distance of some 600 m between the detonation and the aircraft. A second parachute is then deployed to swing the bomb round to an impact angle of between 30 deg and 40 deg to the horizontal, minimising the risk of a ricochet. The rocket motor then ignites to produce 90 kN of thrust lasting about 0·45 seconds. Durandel strikes the concrete at around 260 m a second. After a one second delay the 15 kg of warhead explodes. Against reinforced concrete 40 cm thick, the weapon will produce a 5 m diameter crater at least 2 m deep and will break up a surface area exceeding 250 sq m. According to Matra, it takes more than a day to repair the damaged area and to resume operations.

This information comes from several sources. I ask, first, is it accurate and what is the Government's assessment of the Durandel weapon in relation to the Mount Pleasant airport?

Secondly, what is the Government's assessment of the Argentines' having acquired the Durandel, and have there been discussions with France about it? It seems very unsatisfactory that French industry should continue to supply the most sophisticated weaponry, given the situation in the south Atlantic.

Mount Pleasant has problems because there is no alternative to the Stanley airstrip. I ask, thirdly, could the Stanley airstrip take the TriStar on an emergency landing, because the whole policy, in the view of many of us, is vulnerable? Here we have a big runway, which therefore presents a big target.

I ask about the size of the repair squads. This may be classified information, on which I would not press the Government, but it would take only one Durandel to create havoc. What are the support facilities, and are the Government prepared to give possible targets and any indication of the sheer cost of the repair squads in Royal Engineer terms? That is my fourth question.

Fifthly, on the whole airbridge operation, what about the escorts? Whether conflict starts again is irrelevant to the Air Force debate, but I do not think that Alfonsin is going to start a war. However, the Argentine military have not gone away. Macho men humiliated are dangerous and it could well be, heaven help us, that the Falklands is used as an excuse for what many of them want to do anyway —destabilise the infant civilian regime. Therefore, we have to talk about the hypothetical situation of hostilities and I have to ask about escorts and how many are needed, because presumably everything in the airbridge, particularly the TriStars, has to be escorted.

This leads me to question no. 6, the whole question of interception. They do have Skyhawk. Is it the Government's assessment that they have Sidewinder? If they have, what representations have we made to the American Government about the supply of Sidewinder?

The whole interdiction situation really puts pressure on the entire line of flight. It is a very long chain of access to the Falklands, given also that there are heat-seeking missiles and the possible possession by the Argentines of Condors with German rockets and Italian guidance systems, approaching the Mount Pleasant airport at 4,000 miles an hour from a distance of under 500 miles; this really is a problem for Rapier.

I ask question 7: What is the assessment of that?

If a runway is lost the brutal question 8 that has to be faced is, can our Phantoms operate, because then we would have no long-range interceptors? Once it was put out of action, presumably, without the Phantom cover it could be kept closed day after day. Once closed, the long-range interceptors—this is a curate's egg situation—cannot operate. It may be that there are many emergency arrangements for quick repairs. I do not know whether it is proper to ask question 9, but what are the contingency plans? In the eventuality of any fighting, these are highly relevant questions.

My next question, no. 10, concerns air-to-air refuelling and the resulting effect on our tanker squadrons, which are certainly needed in Europe. Can we have extra tankers? What is the standby force in the South Atlantic? Our tanker resources are somewhat scarce. I do not know whether the Government are prepared to comment on that.

I come to question 11. We know that Argentina has developed relations with Israel. Is it the Government's assessment that they have anti-radiation missiles from the Israelis? I put this in terms of pure speculation as I do not know whether such missiles have been supplied by the Israelis, but I know that Argentina has received advice from the Israelis, who are extremely good at tearing up runways. It is clear that there is a heavy logistic requirement in keeping an airport such as Mount Pleasant in operation. Money is important but to what extent are the resources that we are making available in the south Atlantic at the expense of air defence in Europe? Even if there is no fighting—heaven forbid that it should take place—considerable pressure can be imposed and one can be extremely nasty without killing anyone. The vulnerability of land-based planes in the south Atlantic is considerable. We are adopting a policy there that is rather different from our policy in Europe.

My 12th question concerns the cost of the Mount Pleasant airfield, which I understand is at least £350 million. The Minister may say that this is a matter for the Department of the Environment. If he does, I shall accept that response. He will be aware that there are questions on this topic on the Order Paper. However, I should like to know rather more about the crime that we read about. I understand that if people are couped up in temporary accommodation on building projects there is the possibility of an awkward situation. Against the background of press reports and the stories that some of us have been hearing — to which I have not given publicity — about crime in the construction of the airfield, there should be a Government statement.

My next question, no. 13, is directed to the cost of our presence on Ascension Island. We have a full-scale base developing on Ascension Island and I understand that the cost will be more than £40 million. When we think of the cuts at home, the £40 million that will be spent on Ascension Island highlights the incredible cost of the Government's policy in the South Atlantic.

My 14th question is about the cost of the extra TriStars, to which the Minister referred in opening the debate. I understand that there are to be three extra TriStars. Is it intended that they should be on standby?

My 15th question is on a different subject but one that is related to the previous issue. It is directed to Wintex '85 and the rules of engagement. In the light of the subject of 1982, which, rightly, I am forbidden to go into tonight, it seems that the change in the rules of engagement was extremely muddled, which is alarming in itself. Alternatively, orders on a particular occasion were given to the war cabinet. Who alters rules of engagement? I am not asking how alterations in rules of engagement are translated into fleet tactics or into Air Force tactics because I understand that the translation can be secret and sacrosanct. That is the proper domain of secrecy. However, it is right that Parliament should ask for what reasons rules of engagement are changed, to what they are changed and on what basis they are altered.

Wintex '85—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong but I think that he should refer to this issue when he replies — is about command and control and the lessons that should be learned from them. Before April 1983, Argentina had 130 aircraft. After the war it had 70. I understand that it now has 160. Included among them are some extremely sophisticated aircraft from France. For example, there are Mirage IIIs which are Nesher-Israeli adapted. Heaven help us, Argentina has some Mirage Vs. What are we to say — question 16 — to our French colleagues about this supply of arms?

Finally, I turn to a subject on which I am rather sensitive and which I think reflects on all forces. It is said that by constantly asking questions about what has happened in the past one revives painful memories. Therefore, with permission I shall read a letter I have received from Mrs. Iris Hall of 109 Barnes road, Cowley, Oxford. She wrote:

"I have wanted to write to you for many months but with my husband so desperately ill, thought it might be unwise if it got back to him and could upset him further. However, he died today, having been very ill for more than two years, since he never got over our only son Ian's death on HMS Coventry. I want to say please keep up your fight for what you believe should be."

She who was personally affected wants the truth of what happened, as does Mrs. Patricia Potter of Oriel cottage, Stafford road, Fordhorses, Wolverhampton, whom I saw last week. Her nephew, Lieutenant Adrian Anslow, was killed on the Atlantic Conveyor. I shall read a letter from an ex-service man, Squadron Leader Peter Nettleton, DFC, who wrote:

"It seems clear to me that the tireless persistency and integrity which you have shown on the Belgrano affair were reflected in today's Ponting verdict at the Central Criminal Court. You will doubtless agree that the verdict itself amounts to a massive vindication of the much criticised jury system. My thanks, congratulations and best wishes, Peter Nettleton."

I have read these letters because I know that there are some service men who have been upset by my recent activities. However, there are others who think that the truth should come out.

Finally, I want to make it clear that as a junior and new Member I used to visit a man who was married to my father's favourite cousin, and a distant relative of mine, who was a marshal of the Royal Air Force, Arthur Tedder. He used to impress upon me—this was at a time when he was physically ill, though mentally alert — that politicians had considerable obligations to the services. In my view, one of those obligations at present is to be concerned about the defence of our country and to make it clear in Parliament that questions should be asked about policies involving the services when it is not quite proper that the services should be asked to carry them out. I believe that even in military terms it is important that questions be asked about the role of the RAF—however skilled, courageous and dedicated to their profession its personnel might be—that the House is giving it in the south Atlantic.

8.58 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I had not thought that it would be my privilege to follow the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Having heard what he said, I will forgo taking a similar approach to that of the hon. Gentleman. His actions, whether well motivated and well meant, have done a disservice to the nation. We are fortunate in having a Government who have the guts to take right and tough decisions, particularly at a time of crisis. I have had not one letter or telephone call of complaint from my constituents. I had a message from a constituent of a neighbouring Member of Parliament who said that the Government were right in their decision on the General Belgrano. Many of my constituents asked why that decision had not been taken earlier.

It is a great pleasure for me to take part in this debate, the first on the Royal Air Force in which I have had the opportunity to participate. I come to it without a special constituency interest. Sadly I have no aircraft factory or Royal Air Force station in my constituency; we would welcome either in Cannock if we could persuade them to come. I have some modest credentials in so far as I have served for three years in my university air squadron at Southampton and was commissioned in the Royal Air Force volunteer reserve, whose tie I proudly wear today.

There are three issues of major concern, two of which have already been referred to. In regard to air staff target 412, I was alarmed at the remarks by my right hon. Friend at the outset that the Minister of Defence is still persisting with the idea that the option of resparring the Jet Provost remains open. That is wrong for several reasons. The Minister should put that ball firmly out of court now.

The Jet Provost is 25 years old. Even if it were resparred, we would still have a thirsty turbo jet whose equipment is many years old. Originally about 19 companies tendered for the new aircraft and we are now down to a shortlist of four. Those companies have gone to considerable expense in order to be able to tender for the contract. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement will be able to reassure us tonight that resparring the Jet Provost is out.

Originally there was anxiety amongst the professionals in the Royal Air Force that we were even contemplating a turbo prop solution rather than a turbo fan aircraft which everyone knows was on the British Aerospace drawing board. I understand that many of the sceptics have been won over to the idea of a turbo prop as a result of their experience with aeroplanes which are currently flying.

The competition has done a useful service in that it has resulted in the Royal Air Force definitely being provided with an aeroplane which will be superior to the one it would originally have been offered. All the companies have gone out of their way to ensure that they have fine-tuned their offers to produce the best option.

I speak with a personal interest because it was possible for me last summer to spend three days at the central flying school, flying a variety of aeroplanes, including the Jet Provost mark 3 and the Jet Provost mark 5. In the mark 5 I was undertaking a typical low-level sortie that a student would undertake, with the objective of flying over the Pennines at 250 ft to locate a target and fly back. The importance of speed in the equation was impressed upon me.

Unless a student pilot is pushed to fly at high speeds of around 300 knots, there will be a substantial leap between the speed of the basic trainer and the aeroplane which the student will next fly, the Hawk. This low-level exercise is central to the role of training in the Royal Air Force today. Today's modern aircraft fly at a low level. Therefore, it is important that a student gets such experience from the outset.

Speed is also important because it enables the aircraft to climb quickly through our invariably muggy weather where there is low cloud, very often extending up to 10,000 or 15,000 feet. Therefore, we want an aircraft which can get up to a working height as quickly as possible. I am pleased that the Minister is considering a speed of a usable 240 knots instead of a desirable 240 knots. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best); I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber at the moment. He had a point when he said that the goalposts have been shifted. Air staff target 412 was not drawn up correctly.

All four companies which have tendered have met the specification but they have a valid criticism. Some of them, principally the company tendering for the Firecracker, say that they were told that the speed should be 210 knots, with 240 knots at the maximum, and now the Ministry is saying that the usable speed should be 240 knots. Therefore, I have that sympathy with them.

I agree—I think that this is the mood of the House today—that we do not want a political aeroplane. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has got that message—I am sure that he has—and that he will convey it to the Secretary of State and his colleague, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement. It would be wrong to favour one area of the country with jobs as against another. As has been said, if jobs were created in one area, they could be lost in another. It would also be wrong to allow foreign policy considerations to enter into the argument. It would be wrong to buy an aeroplane simply to boost the balance sheet of a company that the Government have high hopes of bringing into the private sector—that is, Short Brothers, which is an excellent, first-class company. I agree with privatisation, but it would be wrong if we were to make the major objective privatisation rather than finding the right aeroplane for the RAF.

All the contenders, in their way, are excellent aeroplanes. They would not have been on the final list if they were not. I have flown two of them—the Tucano and the PC9—so I speak with some experience of them. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), I have not flown the Firecracker. The Westland A20 is not even off the drawing board.

The campaign has often been vitriolic. I should like to deal with each of the contenders in turn. I strongly commend the initiative that has been taken on the Firecracker. I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends do as well. The people in the company have put their money where their mouth is. They have done what the Government have asked the industry to do and what they have asked our talent in the design teams to do, which is to produce a British product that can be a world-beater. However, I believe that they have not been entirely straight in the way in which they have conducted their campaign on Firecracker because it is not an all-British aeroplane. For a start, the engine is Canadian and other parts, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn was not willing to divulge to us, are not of British manufacture. For example, I understand that the escape system is a United States Stencil system, although I believe that the company is considering putting in a Martin Baker seat.

Westland is an excellent company, and we have heard from the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) about it, as well as from my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin), who eloquently put the case for it. It is important that we look carefully at the predicament in which Westland finds itself over its helicopter production schedule. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take careful note of that. That aeroplane is not off the drawing board yet, so the RAF is entitled to look at something that is flying.

Mr. Wiggin: Will my hon. Friend consider the history of aircraft acquisition by the RAF? Every major aeroplane bought since the last war and, indeed, some during and before it, has been bought off the drawing board. Therefore, that criticism is not valid.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that remark. What he says is true. However, we are faced with real as well as drawing board options. There are some good real options, so we should look more carefully at them.

I have already saluted Short Brothers. It has done a magnificent job. Its recent order in China was the latest in a series of highly successful deals that it has pulled off under its highly dynamic and excellent chairman, Sir Philip Foreman. However, there are one or two problems with the Tucano in terms of export prospects. There is already the Embraer 312, on which that aeroplane is based, and there is the aeroplane that is being produced under licence in Egypt, both of which will be competing for that export market. Although Shorts' Tucano will be a more sophisticated aeroplane than its competitors, it faces a ready-made competitive market.

It is not true to say that British Aerospace does not need this contract. It needs this contract just as much as the other companies. We should not put British Aerospace out of court simply because it is the major defence and aeroplane manufacturer in this country.

The Hawk and PC9 package is a sensible support package. Although it is true that the Swiss are not committed to buying the Hawk, it is true also that, if the PC9 is not bought, there is no chance whatsoever that the Swiss will buy the Hawk. We should bear that important point in mind.

It is not my job to evaluate the technical merits of these aeroplanes, because that has already been done at Boscombe Down. I do not deny that, in a sense, I speak for the Royal Air Force, although I am in no way authorised to do so. I believe, as do most other hon. Members who have spoken in this debate, that the aeroplane that is chosen must be the one that the RAF wants. I have drawn on my experience as a pilot—admittedly, of limited hours—and I believe that speed is the vital factor. One aeroplane is faster than the rest. It is important to note that, if the AST412 was wrong in the first place, it is not my job as an hon. Member to go along with a mistake. Speed is important and the PC9 is marginally ahead of the rest. I believe that that is the position as the RAF sees it.

Mr. Robert Atkins: As my hon. Friend knows, I do not hold a particular brief because I was not a pilot——

Mr. Wilkinson: Except for British Aerospace.

Mr. Atkins: That is not true. I do not hold a brief for any particular organisation. The Garrett engine has now been made available to the Tucano, and, in terms of speed, the Garrett engine will exceed the RAF's requirements. That puts a whole new complexion on the Tucano.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is correct. I was discussing this matter the other night with Short Brothers. The fact is that that engine has not yet been mated with the aircraft frame. There must be further developments. It is not for me to judge whether that is good or bad; it is for the Royal Air Force to judge. I am trying merely to bring to the debate some of my experience as a trainee pilot sitting in the front seat having my head beaten by an instructor and being told not to make mistakes.

There are pros and cons to be considered when proposing collaboration. Although collaboration may be a splendid objective, complex decision-making procedures —often involving changes of Government—must take place. Those procedures can result in lengthy discussions on whether to proceed with a decision taken by a previous Government, on the work share allocation and on differences of objective. I believe that differences of objective are the most important factor to consider in contemplating collaboration. I heartily endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) said about collaboration. I believe that the project is already slipping. British Aerospace needs to develop a new aeroplane in order to keep its design team together. The RAF needs a new aircraft to ensure that it is capable of meeting threats. If we do not take action swiftly, export markets that are currently open to us will be lost for good.

For those reasons, I urge my right hon. Friend to make a swift decision one way or the other. Some Conservative Members are outraged at the fact that the French are trying to delay this project to advantage the Mirage 2000 and to ensure that they get what they want at our expense. There is no doubt that the home solution could be remarkably cheap, and probably as cheap as a collaborative programme, especially bearing in mind that collaboration itself has costs.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will take an early decision and that he will not close the door to the possibility of a United Kingdom solution.

9.15 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I have not had the flying experience of the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), although I did fly Tiger Moths in the early to mid-1950s. We had leather helmets and gloves in those days. However, I have had a little experience of procurement. As I know that other hon. Members want to speak, I shall be brief and address myself to one issue—the jet trainer replacement.

I was interested to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) describe the programme of procurement of a new aeroplane to replace the Jet Provost. I will not go into the details, but it is a remarkable process. We are now going through a rebidding operation, which is of great concern to me. I hope that the Minister will comment on that.

I understand that initially there were 20 contenders for the contract, of which four were short listed. After some wise and pound foolish of the Government still to put forward that idea. Many millions of pounds would be spent on an aircraft with a very short life.

There has been a remarkable agreement on both sides of the House—between Haltemprice and Hull, west and between Scunthorpe and Hull, north—about what plane the RAF should have. When the time comes for a decision, I hope that it will be made on the basis of what the RAF needs—not upon what Humberside, Belfast or Westland need. We have a duty to ensure that we provide the people whom we expect to fly the aircraft and protect the nation with the best training aircraft available. We all have our own ideas of what that is, but the consensus is that we should provide the plane that the RAF wants.

Hon. Members have expressed their concern about what will happen to the European project for the new fighter plane. All hon. Members have mirrored the fear, almost to the point of becoming paranoid, about the role of the French and their attitude to the Mirage 2000. Perhaps behind the scenes the Secretary of State is flexing his muscles rather than swinging the Mace and working hard and long. However, we have the impression that the French are making the running. It seems that the Secretary of State, in his desire to appear to be a good European and to escape from the idea that we are not really part of Europe, is submerging some of our basic national interests. The message from the House should be that we want firm assurances. The defence of our country and the maintenance of a firm industrial base upon which we can defend our country requires early decisions.

That argument from both sides of the House is that, despite what has been said today and despite what the Government are doing about collaborative projects, Westland should have an early decision on the helicopter to relace the Puma and the Wessex. That is important in industrial terms and in national strategic terms.

Sometimes we tend to be a little parochial in that we concentrate on our own industries and interests. My hon. Friend the Member for Shieffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) and the hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall) reminded us of the importance of the RAF plane in its NATO role and some of the problems involved in the need for a stand-off ability in our airfield destruction weapons. That is important.

Repeatedly our attention is drawn to the United Kingdom's vulnerability and the problem posed by the disaster, for which we all share responsibility, of the Nimrod early warning system. We are right to be concerned about that. We must consider the importance of an early warning system. If the Shackleton cannot provide it, we must wait a long time for Nimrod. We should consider whether we can afford to gamble for another three or four years. As the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said, the possibility of leasing AWACS until we reach decisions would not meet some of the proper anxieties of the House.

Different people have different attitudes about the campaign that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has waged concerning the Falklands. I have not always agreed with him, but it is right and proper that he should have raised his anxieties in his role as a Member of Parliament. The Opposition supported the Falklands campaign as we have no time for invasion and the resolution of international differences by unprovoked aggression. However, the Government and the Conservative party are out of touch with the country in that, having successfully conducted that campaign, they do not realise that we should turn our attention to resolving the fortress Falklands issue to get away from the great drain that the Falklands will be on our defence capability.

A great responsibility lies on the Government in initiating such procedures. It is a case of being magnanimous in victory. There should also be a note of caution as we know what has been supplied to and obtained by the Argentine Government since their defeat in the Malvinas. Our international relations and Britain's primary defensive role are not helped by our having a festering sore in the South Atlantic. It is also no help to us for a large part of our Air Force effort to be concentrated there. The Opposition's policy has been to try to find some proper accommodation with Argentina. We must not drop our guard or be prepared to be rolled on again, but we must be prepared to talk.

There has been a sense of unreality about the debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) said, it is taking place under the shadow of Trident. We do not know what it will cost. With the pound going up and down against the dollar like a yo-yo, expenditure on what we regard as a superfluous system will be increased. The Trident expenditure will impinge ever more on our ability to pay for the defence of our country by proper conventional methods.

We want a proper conventional defence—a strong Air Force and a strong industrial base. All that is being put at risk. The Government said that they will not introduce another White Paper. They will have to introduce another White Paper and another defence review or they will introduce no programmes but try to pretend that everything is fine. If that happens, the Secretary of State will build up problem after problem for his successors. That is not the proper role of the Secretary of State. He must meet the new challenges within the limitations that his budget puts on him. If he does not do that, we shall end up with structural disarmament, That would be a tragedy for Britain and the free world.

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): It gives me great pleasure to close this year's Royal Air Force debate. This Government can be justifiably proud of their record of spending and support for the RAF. Since we came to power, expenditure on air systems, most of which goes to the RAF, has risen over 40 per cent. in real terms, as was mentioned earlier by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. Expenditure on RAF equipment for 1985-86 is estimated to be £3,506 million and a total RAF complement of around 93,000 represents expenditure approaching £38,000 per person.

As an article in the Financial Times said on Tuesday of this week:

"The RAF is in the throes of its biggest re-equipment programme since the Korean war."

This continuing programme is reaching its peak and will mean that by 1989 over half of our aircraft will have been recently replaced. This compares with five years ago when half our front line was over 20 years old. With the greatest respect to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones), I do not see the picture that he painted of the RAF. Inevitably, though, with 1985-86 bringing an end to the 3 per cent. expenditure increases, our budget is increasingly tight, given the costs and sophistication of modern aircraft, weaponry and software. That is why we are striving for greater efficiency, competition and international collaboration on defence spending, with emphasis upon improving the teeth-to-tail ratio and upon increasingly involving the private sector in support tasks and by putting schemes out to contract.

Mr. Carter-Jones: If the hon. Gentleman is so convinced that we are on target, will he tell us what aircraft we shall have in 1995 to defend us in a fighting capacity, given that more than 10 years are needed to develop such an aircraft?

Mr. Lee: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and give him a list of the aircraft which we expect to have in operation in 1995.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Can the hon. Gentleman not give those details now?

Mr. Lee: No, I cannot do so now because I have very many points to deal with.

I was not surprised to hear mention of the competition to provide a new trainer for the RAF to replace the aging Jet Provost. There were speeches from hon. Members which supported each of the individual contenders. On the PC9, there was the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). His broad approach is that what is good for Brough is good for Britain. While one understands his constituency interests, I believe that the hon. Gentleman was unfair in being so disparaging about a number of the other contenders when he does not have all the facts and figures in front of him, in particular the financial aspects. Support for the PC9 was also given by my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall), the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and for my hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). Support for the A20 came from my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin). The case for the Shorts Tucano was made by the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) and the Hunting Firecracker was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), who also had an Adjournment debate on that topic.

We currently have about 160 Jet Provosts in service but they have outdated avionics, high fuel consumption, side by side seating and a poor ratio of support man hours to flying hours. They would need major refurbishments to meet the pilot training need beyond the end of the decade, but I have to say that we have not yet ruled out the refurbishment option. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh"] Despite the obvious groans, my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) pointed out earlier that if that refurbishment option did go ahead it would give him and his constituency some work and that that was his reserve option.

Quite naturally, attention has focussed on the requirements of ASR 412 and the evaluation of a new trainer aircraft. We are looking at an order for some 130 aircraft with an option for a further 15. It would be a turbo prop with jet-like handling, tandem seating, good climbing power and full aerobatic performance. Obviously we also want it to be reliable and economical to operate.

My experience of the past 16 months or so is that competitions of this sort generate a good deal of powerful lobbying and this certainly has been no exception, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare. The competition has provided excellent business for the restaurants and hostelries around Westminster. It has benefited considerably the stationery industry. The post office has also done extremely well.

No-one will be surprised if I say that we listen very carefully to all the points that are made to us and that we take into account in coming to a decision a very wide range of relevant factors.

It will be even more unsurprising if I say that our evaluations are impartial, and that the relevant factors include broader industrial and economic issues. That is the background against which most of the lobbying takes place. For our part, however, we must restate that the main consideration is to provide the Royal Air Force with a suitable aircraft to fulfil its training requirements.

We asked for best and final offers from two manufacturers — from Shorts, with their Tucano, and from British Aerospace, with the PC9. In the event, we also received best and final offers on the Hunting Firecracker and the Westlands A20.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement earlier indicated to Hunting and to Westlands that they really were not in the competition at that stage but that nevertheless, if they wanted to submit ultimately, at their expense, best and final offers, they would be considered. They were told at that stage that they were not likely to be considered, in order to save them further money. I suggest that the competition has been handled extremely fairly by the Ministry and that ultimately the RAF will get a very good buy, assuming that it goes ahead with a new trainer.

Mr. McNamara: Can the hon. Gentleman say when?

Mr. Lee: The decision will be taken in the spring. [HON. MEMBERS: "Which spring?"] Spring 1985.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the European fighter aircraft, commonly known as EFA — perhaps some day I shall be able to say "affectionately known as EFA". We are still at a complex and difficult stage of studies and negotiations.

The hon. Member for Kingston Upon Hull, North dealt with the whole matter of EFA, as did the hon. Member for Eccles, and my hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, West, for Cannock and Burntwood and for Arundel (Mr. Marshall).

A particularly strong plea that I shall not forget was made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble, who spoke most passionately and most eloquently, as he always does in matters affecting British Aerospace and his constituents who work at Warton in the South Ribble constituency. I fully understand his sentiments. As a Lancashire MP, I know the importance of Warton and have a number of sub-contracting companies to British Aerospace in my constituency.

In the mid-1990s we shall need to replace our current force of Jaguars and Phantoms. So far, we and four other countries — France, Germany, Italy and Spain — have agreed on a European staff target that specifies a single seat, twinengined, agile, short-take-off-and-landing fighter. This will be primarily an air defence aircraft but with good ground-attack capability. We shall need about 250 such aircraft.

[Mr. Stuart Randall]

considerable time, there was a further shortlisting—a short shortlist—of two, the manufacturers of the PC9 and the Tucano. They were then—and this is quite remarkable—asked to submit another bid, the effect of which was to open up the whole position. The manufacturers which were knocked out in the short short-listing procedure asked their parliamentary representatives to lobby the MoD and all and sundry to be put back on the list. The consequence is that there are now at least four contenders. From what the Minister said in his opening remarks, I understand that a refurbished Jet Provost is back on the list, but I am not sure whether that is an additional contender, making five in all. The asking for subsequent bids is inept because of the pressure to get companies that were knocked out back on the list. That has shown that there is uncertainty and confusion.

An article in Flight International on 2 February entitled "Modus Operandi" is worth reading. It describes in detail some of the disadvantages of that approach. Once we go back to having four companies submitting additional bids, that means additional development work for them and the expenditure of extra money, which is a waste of the nation's resources. It is not the way to go about these matters.

The problem has emerged mainly from the fact that none of the turbo trainers was really suitable apart from the PC9, although that has had to have larger power units and, because of the specification produced by the RAF, the company is trying to re-engine the plane. This waste of resources could have been avoided had another process taken place. As a result, we are putting in larger engines, and the relationship between airframe life, range, fuel consumption, capacity, weight and so on will be upset. If the PC9 is not selected, it could result in a risky project —and we have already heard about Nimrod.

If we attempt to doctor these things, will we end up with another delayed project and perhaps even with an aeroplane with which the RAF would be dissatisfied? A more straightforward process could be achieved if we first selected the type of aircraft which is best for the job. We could then have a competitive tender on that, followed by a second stage when there would be further competitive bids from the manufacturers and the various consortia which were prepared to provide the aircraft that best fitted the bill.

The advantage would be that the RAF would end up with the aeroplane that it wants, and the Treasury would be able to get the plane that it wants at the price that it wishes to pay. Consequently, everyone would win. In addition, this more logical approach to procurement would create more jobs and a stronger industry. We would be able to buy more aircraft and would have a better defence for Britain.

This venture into competitive tendering is a worthwhile approach, but I wonder whether there is a lack of direction in carrying out the procurement process. My strong opinion is that jobs should be taken into account. There is no doubt in my mind that we must have the best aircraft for the RAF, but we should create as many jobs as possible.

Many of my constituents work at Brough. It has been suggested that, with the PC9, 85 per cent. of the airframe work for the RAF planes would in man hours be carried out in Britain, and that 15 per cent. would be carried out by the Swiss Pilatus company.

The hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall) referred to further orders. British Aerospace is optimistic about further sales if we choose the PC9. I understand that about 24 planes are required in Switzerland and that the 160 Swiss Hunters require replacement. There is optimism that these could be replaced by the single-seat Hawk 200.

Humberside is a region of high unemployment, and in my constituency male unemployment is now 20·5 per cent. This project would be important, given that there is a lack of high technology industry in the area. Much of our industry is primary. As well as fishing, there is steel making on the south bank. Consequently, the PC9 project, which I hope the RAF will be supplied with, would stimulate technology and the economy in the area. Trade unions have contributed magnificently in the campaign, and we should recognise that men have spent hour upon hour on it. Some people may say that that is not what they should be doing. Nevertheless, we must recognise that they have made every effort to ensure that the PC9 gets work.

The PC9 is the best aircraft. If we opt for one of the botched-up versions of it, several hon. Members will be interested to monitor the project to see whether we have another potential Nimrod on our hands.

9.25 pm

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I declare an interest as a parliamentary adviser to British Aerospace, Space and Communications Division. My specialist interest in space allows me to withhold any comment about the RAF trainer, and I am sure that the Minister will be glad to have one less voice lobbying him tonight. The matter has been well aired.

In the short time available to me I shall concentrate on a matter raised by my hon. Friends the Members for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and that is the fallback position if we cannot get a collaborative venture on the European fighter aircraft. I agree with my right hon. Friends and Opposition Members who said that there must be worries about the slippage in the project.

Anyone who looks at the history of other collaborative projects must recognise that the French national interest has always fought extremely hard. I am worried that the enthusiasm of the French for the Mirage 2000 and their ideas about a new engine for it do not sit happily with our interests. Indeed, their current interest for a light aircraft goes against our perceived views, and adds to the problem. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement will assure us that the Government are already considering the fallback position.

If one takes a dispassionate view, the fallback position could relate to the option of buying American. I hope that my hon. Friend will take the opportunity tonight to make it plain that the Government would think long and hard before they decimated the defence airframe industry in the United Kingdom and removed the avionics capacity, which has been a key element in successful developments, such as Tornado and Jaguar. When he deals with the alternatives, I hope that he will say something about the experimental aircraft programme. Substantial resources have been committed to it. I applaud the Government's willingness to do that and to act quickly. I look forward, as many hon. Members do, to seeing that aircraft fly at Farnborough next year. I hope that by then we shall have in our minds and in the planning of Government a better feel for what the British national solution may be.

From the briefings I have had, I understand that there is a possibility of a British national programme that would not be out of line financially compared with the likely cost of a collaborative programme. That is especially true if one takes out, as one should, the question of the development of a new aircraft engine because that raises wider issues, other possibilities in the export market and so on.

The interest in the EAP can lead to a realistic view of the threat. I am a member of the Select Committee on Defence and think that we should constantly remind ourselves that we are dealing with the threat in the 1990s and, to be more specific, the MIG 90. If we are not careful, in the long-drawn-out processes of Government—this has been one of our failings in the past, as has been getting industrial collaboration moving quickly—we could have slippage, both in time and in meeting that genuine threat.

Before concluding my speech, I cannot help but say a word or two about the Falklands. I went down there about two years ago and, like the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I should like to pay tribute to the remarkable efforts of the air crews. They manage to get not only people like me but far more essential traffic to and from the Falklands. But, unlike the hon. Gentleman, I look forward to the day when the airfield is completed, as that will make life that much more bearable and will enable us to look at the whole question of the Falklands in a better and more productive way.

My text on the Falklands was given to me by a very senior retired RAF officer, a constituent of mine, who said to me when the task force sailed, "Right. You have all joined hands and the will of Parliament is to support this great venture. All I ask is that you make sure that the politicians do not seek to interfere with operational matters thereafter and when the battle is over, I pray you don't spend the next few years trying to suggest where we went wrong."

The hon. Member for Linlithgow has done nothing but that. It grieves me to say to a colleague for whom I have had respect for many years in other matters that he is totally out of touch with the country on this issue, as was his contribution in this debate tonight.

9.30 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for having given me a few minutes in which to make my speech. I represent a constituency that designs and builds aeroplanes, but which does not seem to benefit from them. The PC9 was, I believe, mostly designed at Bembridge. I am a former non-executive director, of Pilatus Brittan Norman. I had to resign two years ago, and I miss the £2,000 a year that I used to earn. But Firecracker was originally put together by Desmond Norman in an outbuilding at Whitwell on the Isle of Wight and was finally completed at Sandown. There is also Westlands, with its subsidiary the British Hovercraft Corporation, which has the A20 with the Australians, and Shorts, which subcontracts much of its work to Cowes. For example, the wings of the 330 and the 360 are built there.

I was told today by Westlands that if it failed with the A20 it would benefit most with the Tucano. Our Northern Ireland colleagues are not in the Chamber now, but they rightly want most of the work involved. At Christmas I wrote to Sir Phillip Forman congratulating him on his publicity, and pleaded with him that, should he be successful, he should subcontract some of the work to the Isle of Wight.

But the real reason for my intervention is that I am scared stiff of what will happen to the British Hovercraft Corporation. Some very able people down there designed and built the hovercraft. The 188 was very successful, but unfortunately the Navy does not seem to want hovercraft. Nevertheless, I am sure that its role in mine countermeasures operations is outstanding and that is an area of defence that we ignore at our peril. That is the sort of role that that hovercraft should be playing. However, that does not seem to be on, and I believe that the old BH7 is now to be sold. The whole future of the British Hovercraft Corporation is tied up with Westlands, so serious consideration should be given to Westlands' plea, which has been echoed in several parts of the House, that the ST404, and particularly the W30, should be brought forward. That would obviously help enormously.

There are 1,500 skilled people working on the Isle of Wight with the British Hovercraft Corporation. That company is our biggest employer. It used to employ more than 2,000 people, but there have been substantial redundancies. The Isle of Wight's unemployment rate is now 17·1 per cent., which, with 300 or more redundancies, would quickly go above 20 per cent. We would then, surely, qualify for assisted area status, but that is not a situation we seek.

The Isle of Wight would be helped if the Castor programme was brought forward. It is a very cheap programme, which uses the Islander aircraft. It does not use a Nimrod, so the Government should ignore any pleas from the RAF to use Nimrod in that role. I believe that the PC9 is the aircraft that the RAF wants. If that is agreed, it will encourage Dr. Buhle—who owns 70 per cent. of Oerlikon Buhle with his sister—to continue investing in the Isle of Wight. It will also help to bring back to Bembridge production of the Islander aircraft. That aircraft is at present produced in Romania. That would create more jobs.

That is my plea, and I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North for allowing me to make it.

9.35 pm

Mr. McNamara: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate.

We have had a very interesting and full debate, despite the shortage of time. Due to the arrangements that usually exist between the Under-Secretary and myself, I think that all those who wanted to speak in the debate have managed to do so. That is good, because every hon. Member should have the opportunity to air his constituency interests and, more importantly, to look at the issue in the round, together with all the problems facing the RAF and our defence industries.

I should like to make a point that I believe has the full support of every hon. Member. We regard it as absolute nonsense to go for the refurbishment of the Jet Provost. That is a relatively uncontroversial statement. It is penny

[Mr. Lee]

Feasibility studies are in hand and the industrial element of those, including participation by British Aerospace and Rolls-Royce, has recently been completed. Those industrial reports were delivered to officials last week and are now being studied in detail in each capital. It would be wrong of me to anticipate the outcome of the national and international assessments but we are proceeding with all speed, and it is intended that the five Defence Ministers should meet in the spring to take stock of the position and decide how best to proceed.

The House will be aware that our starting point is our concern to maximise co-operation and collaboration in Europe while seeking to meet the equipment requirements of the RAF. EFA should become a positive manifestation of that goal. Our work over the coming weeks will be to establish whether that claim can be met while simultaneously ensuring that the legitimate aspirations of the five nations' taxpayers, air forces and industries are properly safeguarded. There is a strong political will in Europe that an EFA programme should be launched and that it should proceed. We shall continue to play our full part in the process of striving for a cost-effective collaboration programme based on fair and equitable terms for all partners.

If we succeed, we shall be launching more than a procurement programme. Therefore, we shall be setting the seal on a new and exciting phase of European co-operation, the political, economic, industrial and defence implications of which could be profound.

While I fully understand some of the anti-French sentiment that has been expressed in the Chamber this evening, it has not, in my view, been over-helpful. Surely we should be trying to bring our nations together in terms of collaboration.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about me, and I know his understanding of the subject, but will he please recognise that, with the pressure on MPs with constituents working in British Aerospace, they need to have more that fine words; they positively want something to happen.

Mr. Lee: I fully understand the comments of my hon. Friend and he does not need to over-egg the pudding; I get the message.

I turn now to Westlands, of particular interest to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), and to my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare. Westlands is and will remain a vitally important defence contractor. The services depend on Westlands for support of in-service helicopters and the production of new aircraft. Ministers of a number of Departments are closely in touch with Westlands. We are fully cognisant of their problems and are working closely with the company.

None the less, the Ministry of Defence supports the company's efforts, encouraged by Government launch aid, to diversify into civil markets. Civil prospects with EH101 and W30 look most encouraging from 1990 onwards. The company will nevertheless continue to need military orders from both the United Kingdom and export markets. We recognise that the company is currently short of orders for production aircraft in the late 1980s. We are therefore considering with them what help the Government can give in generating additional orders in the medium term. I note all that has been said in the debate by a number of hon. Members on the W30.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister has said that he would like to help the company. Does he realise that the greatest help that he can give to the company is a decision one way or the other, in principle and not necessarily tied to a time, on the AST 404? Can he give any indication of the time when such a decision might be forthcoming?

Mr. Lee: I could not give a comment on the precise timing, but I repeat that we are fully aware of the situation at Westlands. I note the hon. Gentleman's constituency interest and his own interest as a small shareholder. On a personal note, when we privatise the Royal Ordnance I hope that he will indicate his support. We will send him a pink form in the hope that he will buy £20 worth of shares in that.

On the question of Nimrod AEW, several hon. Members expressed concern about the delay and cost overruns in this project. Let me say immediately that I share their concern. It is not a procurement exercise of which either the Ministry or industry can be particularly proud.

In the interest of saving time, I will move fairly fast to cover a number of other topics.

The hon. Member for Eccles mentioned British Aerospace, Woodford. We fully appreciate the loading problems faced by British Aerospace in Manchester. We have been considering a number of possible programmes which could be undertaken in the industry and the transfer of Nimrod major servicings is one of these. It is hoped to make an announcement shortly. The future of Woodford must, of course, be primarily a matter for the British Aerospace management to determine but we are aware of the situation there.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West mentioned the subject of reintroducing a flying role for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force when resources permit. I share his wish to improve the role of the Auxiliary Air Force and would draw his attention to our decision to set up a new auxiliary RAF Regiment squadron to provide anti-aircraft defence at RAF Waddington.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) asked whether we were planning to update the Phantom F2 avionics in the same way as we are updating the Buccaneer. In fact, the avionics in the Phantom were fitted much more recently than those in the Buccaneer. This, together with the fact that the Phantom will be largely replaced by the Tornado F2, means that such an update is neither necessary nor cost-effective.

We are also very conscious of the need to update our IFF capability. This was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and others. We are developing with our NATO partners a NATO identification system. This system will incorporate new technology to meet the threat in the electronic environment in the 1990s and beyond.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) and my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley both raised the subject of the long-range stand-off missile. In partnership with the United States and West Germany we have agreed to undertake a feasibility study into options for introducing such a weapon in the 1990s. This study should be completed in November 1986.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked a whole range of questions on his particular topic. I will discuss those questions with my ministerial colleagues and we certainly will take note of them.

On the question of Tornado, which was mentioned by a number of hon. Members and is of specific interest to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble, we are currently considering with the RAF whether we should buy a quantity of Attrition aircraft, but as yet no decision has been taken.

On the whole question of defence sales, there are prospects in a number of countries. I cannot comment on them in detail but in fact — a number of my hon. Friends will bear me out—British Aerospace and British industry have given the Ministry of Defence and its sales team considerable credit for the efforts we have put into the sales effort.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare asked about the Meteorological Office and the cost of the service. I visited the office recently and I can testify that it provides a valuable service in many areas. It was the subject of a resource control review and in implementing the recommendations that flowed from that review the office is actively seeking new ways of exploiting its services in the commercial sector.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and negatived.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Terrorism

10 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I beg to move,

That the draft Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 (Continuance) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.

It is only 12 months since the present Prevention of Terrorism Act completed its passage through the House after the most careful study and detailed debate of its provisions. Year by year the Act it replaced had been scrutinised and reviewed, and that scrutiny was entirely right and proper as is ours now because the powers that have been given to the police and to Ministers since the first Act was passed in 1974 are wholly exceptional and represent a very considerable infringement of the civil liberties normally enjoyed by individuals in this country. This has been said many times over the past 10 years by successive Ministers. It remains true: but sadly it also remains true that terrorism is a menace to our society and the need for legislation is as great as ever.

It has become the practice in these debates to survey the incidence of terrorism in the previous 12 months and draw attention to the worst and most bloody examples. This year it is hardly necessary to do so. The bombing of the Grand hotel, Brighton on 12 October filled us all with a particular horror and outrage. That outrage was shared by the country as a whole because the Brighton bomb was intended to strike a grievous blow at the very heart of our constitution and our democratic system. My right hon. Friend has already informed the House of the results of Mr. John Hoddinott's inquiry into the security arrangements at Brighton and of the measures we are taking to look closely and urgently at the security requirements of similar events in future. But while all sensible safeguards will be applied we can say to the terrorists now that whatever foul deeds they perpetrate, however vile their acts, we shall not play into their hands by changing the way in which government is carried on in this country, with Ministers not only accountable to Parliament but accessible to the public.

There have, of course, been other terrorist incidents in the past year. Despite the successes of the security forces, the terrorist groups concerned with Northern Irish affairs have remained active, particularly in the Province itself. Over Christmas and the new year a series of arrests on Merseyside and elsewhere attracted considerable attention from a number of hon. Members and from the press. The House will be aware that six people are now awaiting trial for conspiracy to cause an explosion; and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on their cases further.

A significant change in the 1984 Act was the explicit extension of the powers of arrest and extended detention to those involved in international terrorism. It was very soon made clear how necessary that extension was and how truly international the threat from terrorism has now become. Within weeks of the passage of the Act, WPC Yvonne Fletcher was shot down in St. James's Square, in an appalling instance of brutal and futile violence.

When the 1984 Bill was going through Parliament Members of this House and another place were rightly concerned about the enlargement of the scope of section 12. The House will recall that my right hon. Friend gave a firm assurance that chief officers of police would be advised that the powers in respect of international terrorism should be used only where there was a prospect of a criminal charge in this country or of action under the Immigration Act 1971. I hope right hon. and hon. Members will have been reassured by the statistics that have been published on the use of this new power. In the period from 22 March to 31 December 1984, there were a total of 44 detentions in connection with international terrorism. In 18 of these cases my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary authorised extensions of detention beyond 48 hours; 13 persons were subsequently deported or removed from the United Kingdom under the Immigration Act and eight others were charged with criminal offences. In only one case in which an extension of detention was granted was the person released without charge and not excluded from this country. I hope the House will agree that those figures suggest a restrained and controlled use of an important power in response to a significant problem.

It would clearly not be in the national interest for me to disclose what it was that each of the 44 persons detained was suspected of doing or planning, or to discuss general trends or patterns of behaviour. But I am absolutely convinced that acts of international terrorism have been prevented from taking place in this country during the past year by police use of the new powers given to them last March, and that it was only by the use of those powers that those acts of terrorism could have been so prevented. Two cliches that are often heard are that we live in a dangerous world and that it is a small world. In the field of terrorism both are very true: violence or political tension in one apparently isolated area can so often explode in murder and destruction on the other side of the globe, in a country wholly uninvolved in the original dispute. We must continue to make it unmistakably clear that we are not prepared for this country to be turned into a battleground for foreign feuds and alien causes.

When the 1984 Act was going through Parliament, we gave a commitment to appoint a person to look each year at the working of the legislation and to produce a report to assist Parliament in the consideration of any order providing for the continuation of the Act. Sir Cyril Philips agreed to undertake that task, and copies of his first report were placed in the Library of the House earlier this week. We would like to record our gratitude to Sir Cyril for the work he has done and for producing, with commendable speed, a report which is both clear and helful.

There is entirely legitimate interest and concern in what is an exceptional piece of legislation; and we hope that this independent view of an area in which security considerations seldom allow the full facts of individual cases to be disclosed will go some way towards allaying that concern. I am, of course, pleased that Sir Cyril is broadly satisfied that the Act is being used properly and I hope that others will draw reassurance from his conclusions. He has also raised a number of more detailed points to which it clearly would not be possible for me to give definitive answers at this stage, but I would assure the House, as my right hon. and learned Friend has told Sir Cyril Philips, that we shall give all his comments the closest consideration.

My right hon. and learned Friend has received a report from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary on the work of the police operating the port controls provided for under the Act. The report deals with security arrangements and is therefore not suitable for publication, butt the detailed recommendations are receiving careful consideration, and I can take this opportunity to say a word or two about the inspectors' reaction to Lord Jellicoe's recommendation that all passengers on commercial flights and sailings between Great Britain and Ireland should complete landing and embarkation cards. The inspectors were asked to assess the resource implications of that recommendation, and in the light of their conclusions and the views that have been expressed on the security and other considerations, my right hon. and learned Friend has decided that it would not be appropriate to implement Lord Jellicoe's recommendation, and that in general a more selective use of those cards is to be much preferred. I am sure the House will welcome that because the present system whereby so-called "carding" takes place at Heathrow only in emergencies, but at Gatwick and most other airports the whole time, and at seaports on a selective basis, is a source of considerable irritation and annoyance to travellers.

The draft order that is before the House seeks to continue the Act in exactly its present form for the next 12 months. There is provision in the Act for certain sections only to be renewed and for parts of the Act to be allowed to lapse: and I have no doubt that we shall hear later this evening not only criticism of the Act as a whole and opposition to its continuation, but criticism of particular powers in the Act. I emphasise once again that we draw no satisfaction from the continuance in force, over 10 years after its original introduction, of this emergency legislation. But only 12 months have elapsed since there was the fullest debate and the most painstaking consideration of every line of the legislation. And it is simply too soon, after St. James's square and Brighton, too soon, after a year of tension and terrorism in so many countries of the world, to contemplate any change that might dangerously diminish the ability of the forces of law and order to protect us all against the terrorist menace. We have consulted the police in England and Wales, in Scotland and in Northern Ireland: they are unanimous in their response that the Prevention of Terrorism Act is an essential weapon in their constant struggle against terrorism. The Government are determined to give them the support they need.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Does my hon. and learned Friend feel that the new initiative in the Council of Europe on terrorism is helpful, and will improve co-operation in the different countries of the Council of Europe?

Mr. Waddington: Of course, it must be helpful for countries to get together and to face together the terrorist threat. There can be no doubt about that.

I ask the House for its support for the renewal of the Act. It is support that I know will not be given lightly and will not be given by any of us without regrets. But it is support that I believe must be given as an unequivocal demonstration of our commitment to this long, thankless, but vital struggle against terrorism.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In this debate, as in previous debates on Northern Ireland when I was a spokesman on Northern Ireland for the Labour party, our hearts and thoughts go out to those whose lives have been lost or torn apart by acts of violence. I therefore gladly associate myself with the Minister's remarks about the Brighton bombing and other acts of terrorism that have been carried out primarily by para-military groups in Northern Ireland but also by other groups around the world. There is universal agreement in the House on that point.

I have a minor gripe, although it has major implications for the way in which we conduct these debates. Last year in the other place, Lord Elton gave the commitment that the report by Sir Cyril Philips would be available early enough to enable the House of Lords to consider amendments. We presumed that that commitment extended to this House. The letter sent to the Minister by Sir Cyril Philips shows that that was the intention. We have had too short a time to enable hon. Members to consider the details of Sir Cyril Philips' report and to propose amendments. We have had only two days to look at the report, and I hope that the Minister will take that point on board in relation to next year.

I shall put some questions to the Minister arising out of Lord Jellicoe's review in 1983 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976. The Minister may not be able to give the answers tonight, but if he can, well and good. If he cannot, I look forward to receiving the answers later.

Lord Jellicoe recommended that section 11, which deals with the withholding of information, should be used only when it was suspected that information was being withheld which could, if revealed, prevent acts of terrorism or lead to the apprehension of terrorist offenders. I understand that that is not mentioned in Home Office circular 26/84, but I should like the Minister to give his opinion.

The powers under section 13 apply to immigration and Customs officers. It is not clear whether that main circular has been sent to those officers. I have the impression that that has not happened, although the document provides guidance on the use of the general powers.

Lord Jellicoe recommended that Ministers should take an active part in ascertaining how far the specific purposes for which an extension was granted have been achieved and should satisfy themselves that people are not detained under the Act for longer than is necessary. To what extent has that recommendation been implemented?

I draw the Minister's attention to the case that went before the European Commission on Human Rights. The commission rejected the Government's argument that the men had not exhausted domestic remedies and accepted the claimants' contention that there is no domestic remedy for violations of the European Convention on Human Rights arising from Prevention of Terrorism Act offences. This is a serious matter with legal implications.

The House should take this Act extremely seriously. I always regret the fact that it comes on for consideration late at night and for a relatively short debate. I shall attempt to take up as little time as possible, but I wish to reiterate some important items.

We all understand the circumstances in which the Act was originally passed. The 1974 pub bombings provided an emotive backdrop.

We must address ourselves to four primary questions. First, does the Act, on the best judgment available, prevent terrorism? Secondly, are the acknowledged — everyone acknowledges them — infringements of civil liberty too great to justify the continuation of this Act in a democracy? Thirdly, is the Act in danger of becoming permanent? Fourthly — this question is extremely important—does the Act seriously alienate sections of the community so as to make it counter-productive?

Having lived with the Act for 10 years, and having examined in considerable detail and depth the figures available to us, the Labour party's answer is, first, that there is little, if any, evidence to suggest that it prevents terrorism. The Minister said that many people think that the Act is necessary. Sadly, no one has spelt out why he thinks it is necessary. Secondly, the infringement of civil liberties—especially in view of what I said a moment ago—is too great for a democracy to accept. Thirdly, the Act is in danger of becoming permanent. Fourthly, it is a serious alienation of many people in Britain and Northern Ireland and is, therefore, counter-productive.

I acknowledge, as I know the Minister acknowledges, that whether the Act prevents terrorism is a matter of judgment—we cannot know. What we do know is that the convictions under the Act for terrorism are few in number, and many of them are not serious enough to attract long prison sentences. Indeed, only a few people receive long prison sentences. We must balance the advantage of putting away people who may be a danger with the disadvantage of the alienation that it causes.

The figures that I shall use are up to and including 1984, and have been drawn from both Home Office figures and figures supplied by the Irish Information Partnership, to which I am indebted for the detailed analysis that it has carried out over a long period. In Britain 5,949 people have been detained; for the United Kingdom as a whole — including Northern Ireland — the figure is 10,309. People charged under the Act in Britain number 152, with 22 in Northern Ireland, bringing the total to 174. Convictions in Britain—not only of offences under the Act, but resulting from people being held and then charged either under the Act or under other Acts—total 348.

From those figures it is hard to argue that the Act is preventing terrorism. Of the convictions in Britain—the United Kingdom figures are not available—42 per cent. were charged under the Act for failure to co-operate. I emphasise that because, if it were not for the Act, that would not be an offence in Britain. Every lawyer of any standing acknowledges that failure to co-operate is anathema to anyone who believes in the democratic system and the rule of law. It has always been something that British lawyers have resisted mightily, as have lawyers in other democratic countries.

Does the Act prevent by deterrence? That is the other argument that must be addressed by the Government and others.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): Is the hon. Gentleman for or against the Act?

Mr. Soley: I am making it clear that the Opposition are against the Act. We have consistently voted against it and will continue to do so.

Mr. Tebbit: Shame.

Mr. Soley: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman takes that view. I understand his feelings and those of many other people. However, I would not have taken the interest that I have taken over the years in Northern Ireland affairs if it was not for my horror at the violence resulting from the problems there. No one — but no one — will take away from me the right not only to feel deeply about that, but to follow through those feelings into rational, political arguments that are designed to clear up the problems which are causing us so many nightmares, and which in particular have caused so many nightmares for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Renewing the Act tonight will save lives.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman mutters and shakes his head, but there are many problems because of this Act. It has added to the number of people who are prepared to support the primary para-military groups in Northern Ireland. I shall give the hon. Gentleman evidence to back that if he will only contain himself and listen to the argument instead of flying off the handle and assuming that he knows the answer to these difficult problems when, in fact, he has only attended the House for occasional aspects of the debates on Northern Ireland and terrorism.

The other argument is that of deterrence. There is very little evidence that the Act works as a deterrent. The sentences which follow a normal conviction for murder, attempted murder and conspiracy to cause explosions would continue to exist without this Act. If those sentences do not deter, there is overwhelming evidence that the convictions and sentences arising from this Act would be no greater a deterrent than the one which already exists — unless we are arguing that random arrest and detention is itself a primary deterrent.

If that is what we are saying, two things follow. First, we must recognise that we are using random arrest, detention and questioning as a way of obtaining information. Secondly, we must recognise that this method of doing so alienates so many people that it acts as a recruiting sergeant major for the para-military groups in Ireland.

Mr. Waddington: It is quite obvious what the feeling is on the Conservative Benches. It is quite outrageous to talk about random arrests. The hon. Gentleman served on the Committee which studied this Bill, and he knows perfectly well that there is no question of random arrests.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) is correct. It drives innocent people into para-military organisations. Over the Christmas holiday, two seamen sailing from Dublin to Liverpool, who had obviously had a drink too many, gave false names. In fact, one said that he was Mickey Mouse. The police detained them throughout the Christmas holiday, and the Home Secretary allowed these innocent people to be detained for seven days. The Government are driving such people into para-military organisations.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend is right, and I intend to give further evidence.

Before I do, I should like to make my position clear. I have been involved in these debates since about 1980 when I first began to get involved. This is the first time that we have had such outbursts from Conservative Members. I understand their strength of feeling following Brighton, but I ask them to understand the strength of feeling which got me involved in the politics of Northern Ireland because of the violence and what it was doing to our democracy. If Conservative Members do not understand that, I am sorry. If they are now behaving in this way because of Brighton, whereas previously they did not—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) would keep quiet and think for a moment, he would not get into such a state. If Conservative Members are doing so, the para-military organisations in Northern Ireland which conduct these atrocious acts will gain courage and advantage from it.

We have a duty to everyone—to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and to the many people in Britain and Ireland who have lost their lives and who have had their families torn apart. We owe it to them to engage in a rational, careful and caring analysis. If Conservative Members do not think I am doing so, that is fine, but they should listen to the arguments and put forward the alternatives. They should not take off and get agitated, as if emotion alone will solve this problem. If emotion could solve the problems of Northern Ireland, we would have solved them years ago.

Are civil liberties being infringed too much? I am troubled about the wording of the Act. As I said time and again in Committee, the exclusion order is, in fact, internal exile. We must acknowledge that. The purpose of the Act is the collection of information. We should also acknowledge that. It enables the authorities to pick up people whom they have reason to believe have Irish connections. It allows the authorities to question them, particularly those who have had contacts with other people known to the security services. By doing so, it allows the authorities to paint a picture of the lifestyle of the people in whom they are interested, not of the ones whom they have picked up.

I shall return to the alienation involved in that, as it is an important part of the argument. In normal circumstances we would be appalled by the power to detain a person for up to seven days, in many cases without contact. Regarding abuse, I ask the Minister to read the article by Joe Sim in the New Statesman of 22 February 1985, to cut down my remarks and save time. I could give many examples and the Minister also knows of many, otherwise he would not have made his comments about the infringement of civil liberties. He must take that on board.

We are arguing that the ordinary law should be and is sufficient. It is in danger of becoming permanent. Although it is written into the Act that it will expire after five years—that was a good inovation—in Committee the word "temporary" was to be dropped. Only the amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and supported by the Labour party reinserted "temporary". The Act has been on the statute book for 10 years. The level of violence in Northern Ireland is the lowest for 14 years—we take pleasure in any small mercy. How much longer will we keep the Act on the statute book? From the Minister's remarks about overseas terrorism, it sounds as though he thinks that the Act must become permanent to deal with overseas groups. Until the last two years, no one ever said that the Act was necessary for that. We have always accepted that the conventional law combined with the powers of immigration officers through the Minister were sufficient to deal with overseas terrorism. No one who considers the matter could come to a different conclusion.

The alienation factor is crucial, and I wish to address my remarks to it carefully. The philosophy of terrorism is to try to force Governments to take extreme action which alienates those groups which the para-militaries seek to represent. R. Moss in "Urban Guerilla Warfare" said:

> "From its original role of keeping the peace between the Catholic and Protestant communities, the British Army moved over to an offensive intended to root out the IRA as a fighting force. Although the new tactics produced military results, they helped to polarize opinion in Ulster and enabled Catholic critics to represent the army as a repressive force. In this sense, IRA terrorism succeeded. It led to a situation where the British Army, which began as the referee between the two communities in Ulster, appeared as a party to the quarrel. The chaos it engendered helped to postpone the application of social reforms designed to get to the root of the problem and thus eroded Catholic faith in solutions within the existing framework."

Many people are unaware of a booklet which has filtered through the para-military groups throughout the world, including the Provisional IRA. It is Carlos Marighella's "Minimanual of the Urban Guerilla." In many ways it is a shocking document, but Conservative Members should read it. He states that a Government have no alternative except to intensify repression because of a para-military group. He states:

> "The police networks, house searches, arrests of innocent people and of suspects, closing off streets, make life in the city unbearable . . . The people refuse to collaborate with the authorities, and the general sentiment is that the government is unjust, incapable of solving problems".

Those thoughts are not academic, but real. They have been a strand of para-military thinking for hundreds of years, but have been more explicitly put during the past 30 years.

Sir Cyril Philips, among many others, recognises the problem when in his report he says:

> "There is too the practical consideration that in containing terrorism the police need is not only special powers but also the support of the public. It is therefore vital that the use of such powers should not alienate any section of the law-abiding population in Great Britain or Northern Ireland."

I shall give an example of the way in which that can work. Incidentally, I welcome the Minister's comments on the carding system. To demonstrate what has been going wrong, I shall quote paragraph 37, which states:

> "In one police force area where total carding is undertaken it is also the practice to follow up the information contained on each card by visiting persons with an apparent Irish connection, and asking them to complete a form containing full details of families and friends. The purpose is apparently to obviate the need for further checks when anyone so listed travels. In the force area in question the total number of people affected is small. This practice seems to me objectionable because it uses controls as a matter of routine surveillance which are intended principally to assist in identifying suspected terrorists who are entering or leaving the country."

That is an example of the way in which the Act goes badly wrong and alientates many people whose co-operation and support we seek. The Federation of Irish Societies, which speaks for many Irish people and people of Irish descent in this country, says that a lot of people see it as discriminatory against Irish citizens, and as divisive and threatening with respect to the Irish community. But, above all, in Britain, 5,482 people were released without charge out of a total detained of 5,949. That represents 92 per cent. of those detained. Conservative Members should bear in mind that it is not just those who are released and who are acknowledged to be innocent who are alienated, but above all their families and friends. Hon. Members should also bear in mind that alientation can take several forms. First, as I know from the evidence, it can lead people to tolerate or to give passive support to the para-militaries. People are also frightened to co-operate with the police.

[Mr. Soley]

When I first became involved in Ireland, people said that it was because there were many Irish voters in my constituency. I am sure that many of my constituents have Irish links, but it is a singularly unpopular issue to be involved in generally, because many Irish people say, "Whatever you do, don't bring the problem over here." When I question them further as to their worries, I find that they are worried either about the para-militaries or about being picked up and questioned by the security forces. They frequently quote the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act. Although one may need to ask the right questions to discover that anxiety and fear, it becomes clear very quickly. Alienation can also lead to covering-up for para-militaries. I know that that has been happening in Northern Ireland. Most importantly, some people become willing to join, and actively support para-military groups.

It is our contention that that judgment outweighs any other judgment on the other side, that the Act's existence prevents terrorism. Thus, on rational grounds, and on an analysis of the facts available, we say that the Act has not succeeded in its primary purpose, and that there is overwhelming evidence to support that view. There is little evidence to support the opposite view, but I should be happy to hear it. This Act, along with the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act — where we do not recommend immediate repeal, as that is not possible, although we recommend major changes to it—form the pinnacle of the anti civil rights legislation that we have allowed to creep on to the statute book over the years.

We must all bear our responsibilities in that regard. We have allowed that to happen, not least because we have failed to respond properly to the problems of Ireland, and to British-Irish relationships during the past 50 or 60 years. We have a great duty in that regard, and our failing has been visited upon the lives of many people outside the House. That is another reason for saying with absolute conviction that my feelings about this issue are as deep and honourable as those of any Conservative Member who so foolishly and, I believe, wrongly thinks that to vote against the Act is in some way to vote for terrorism.

Old-established democracies are rarely lost overnight. There is a slow erosion of civil rights and then comes a crisis, whether economic, military, mass unemployment or hyperinflation, and people wake up to find that the civil rights that defended them no longer exist. This House, more than any other parliamentary assembly in the world, has that reputation to live up to. We have not lived up to it. Britain is an old-established democracy which has gone dangerously far down the road that I have described. It is not too late to turn back, and in doing that we should not be putting lives at risk. Indeed, we might be beginning to grasp the political problems that we have failed to address in the past.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): The Minister said that the events of the past year have illustrated the value of the Act, especially section 12, which the Home Secretary introduced to deal with international terrorism. The Home Secretary accepted the advice of Lord Jellicoe, who wisely concluded that the relationships between various terrorist organisations required action to provide counter-terrorist forces with sufficiently flexible powers to eradicate terrorism and terrorist criminality from the United Kingdom and to enable the United Kingdom to play a significant part in what the Home Secretary called "close co-operation" with other countries. That close co-operation has varied from country to country, and there is considerable room for improvement.

Section 10 gives the Government powers to cope with the vast sums of money at the disposal of terrorist organisations and mentions "acts of terrorism connected with Northern Irish affairs".

I am struck by the role of the individual in section 10. The onus seems to be put on the bank manager of a comparatively small country branch of a bank. I wonder whether international financing of international terrorism and of Irish terrorism are different and whether section 10 needs to be strengthened to prevent the transfer of large sums from country to country and from one major bank to another within the United Kingdom.

I am sure that, in the aftermath of the Brighton bombing, even the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) agrees that we need the Act. In justification of the original Act, which the Labour Government introduced in 1976, he said—I hope that the right hon. Gentleman agrees that his words are relevant today:

"the necessity of protecting the law-abiding majority of Irish citizens living here by demonstrating that the tiny minority of terrorists who lived amongst them would be weeded out and treated with no mercy."—[Official Report, 24 October 1983; Vol. 47, c. 61.]

On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman referred to the origins of the Act which was introduced by a Labour Government of which he was a member and said that it seemed right at the time, and perhaps it was right at the time. We do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman still holds that view.

Mr. Soley: My right hon. Friend adopts a very fair position upon it. He voted against it last time and he will do so again tonight. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) must recognise that this argument is about learning from the experience of the last 10 years. The problem is that the right hon. Gentleman does not want to learn.

Mr. Molyneaux: It would be interesting to know whether the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook wishes to repudiate his own words. What should have led him to believe that terrorists should not be weeded out and treated with no mercy? What has happened in the intervening 10 years to persuade the right hon. Gentleman otherwise?

Mr. Soley: Unusually for the right hon. Gentleman, he is being grossly unfair. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has made his view absolutely clear. He believes, as I do, that acts of terrorism are to be condemned. We should like to catch and lock up those who commit acts of terrorism, but it does not mean that my right hon. Friend has got to vote for this Act, for all the reasons I have given. If my right hon. Friend did not share this view with me, he would not have asked me to be the spokesman against it.

Mr. Molyneaux: The absence of the right hon. Gentleman may be significant, but it is not for me to interpret his absence. I am sure that the law-abiding Irish community who were referred to in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman felt in no less need of reassurance in the days immediately following the Brighton bombing. We on these Benches are filled with admiration for the two Front Bench colleagues of the Minister who have not permitted their injuries and their grief and suffering to stand in the way of their duties to this House. Equally I am sure that the thousands of Roman Catholics in the City of Armagh this very week accept the necessity to weed out terrorists and to treat them without mercy when they re-live the horror of last Sunday when one of their own faith was gunned down on the steps of their cathedral — and perhaps also the horror of today when a community policeman in the same county was gunned down by the IRA.

It is in the intervals of comparative and relative calm between such atrocities that society is at its most vulnerable. It is then that the resolve that terrorists should be weeded out and treated with no mercy is weakened. I know that in the House tonight there are hon. Members who would object to the words "treated with no mercy", but, given the vile nature of terrorists, who would say that every attempt should not be made to ensure that at least they are weeded out?

The Act which we are renewing tonight is the weeder. In agriculture, as in horticulture, a careful weeder will always do his best to ensure that the minimum degree of disturbance is caused to fruitful plants. So this Act, in its modified form, has proved its effectiveness in weeding out. Any slight disturbance or irritation caused to law-abiding people either on this side of the Irish Sea or on the other is very small indeed compared to the horrific death and suffering which the weeds would cause if they were left to sprawl unchecked over the entire community. I know that some will demand proof that murder and mutilation have been prevented by the workings of the Act, but as one who has himself been frequently inconvenienced and seriously delayed by the exercise of the provisions of this Act I can only say that I shall willingly tolerate all of that if there is even the possibility that one human body will not end up as bloody pulp in a plastic bag.

Successive Governments over the past nine years have taken the view that the retention of the legislation is necessary as long as a substantial terrorist threat remains, to use the words of Lord Jellicoe. For those who take a different view, and who mistakenly believe that the legislation feeds terrorism, I have some words of encouragement.

In September 1983 I said that the security situation could look very different in 12 months' time, provided that terrorists were deprived of the hope of attainment of their objective of a united Ireland. For years, terrorists were not deprived of that hope, because successive Governments kept repeating the declaration that a united Ireland would not be achieved by violence. That suited the terrorists very well. for as long as people in Northern Ireland were to be deprived of the right of self-determination decades in advance of the time when they might willingly consent to a change, there was every incentive for the IRA to secure for itself a dominant place in the new order. I had to wait more than 12 months for terrorists to be deprived of that hope, for it took 15 months for the Prime Minister to transmit the signal for which we had hoped and which the IRA dreaded.

When the Prime Minister, on 19 November 1984, rejected the three options designed to override the free choice of the people of Northern Ireland, she made it very clear that the principle of self-determination would prevail over both murder and political intrigue alike. In plain terms, the shared objective would not be achieved by either method.

On 19 November and on subsequent days we were warned and we were told that Republicans would be outraged, that alienation would be increased, and that Ireland North and South, would be convulsed in a blood-bath the like of which had not been predicted since the then hon. Member for Belfast, West — now Lord Fitt — warned us that when the Labour Government decided to provide Northern Ireland with equal and fair representation in this House, there would be a similar outbreak of violence. But in both cases the opposite occurred.

In the recent case, after about 10 days of ritual huffing and puffing, until about the beginning of last December, a surprising calm set in in Northern Ireland. Far from being apart, the two sides of the Northern Ireland community began to come together and to co-operate in all sorts of ways. I know that I am excluding the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), because he has clearly decided to go on an alternative course. Bearing in mind the company that he is proposing to keep, I can only say "Good luck" to him.

The general attitude was and still is, "Well, now we know. There is not going to be a change so we might as well get down to making the best of it together." One can imagine the impact of that grass roots philosophy on the self-styled army council of the Provisional IRA. Now it, too, knows that the objective is not going to be achieved by anybody.

No one in his right mind would venture to predict when murderers will stop murdering, in this nation or in any other land, but of one thing we can be certain. The stability created by the Prime Minister's unambiguous declaration makes life very hard indeed for thugs, for normality is their greatest obstacle, and it is slowly dawning on them and on their fellow travellers that although they can kill and be killed, that which they regard as the prize is now set far beyond their reach. Provided that this time they are deprived of a rescue brigade in the form of a weakening of Parliament's resolve, or a let-up in the pressure upon the terrorist organisations, I think that all of us on each side of the House can look forward to the time when this now essential legislation can be set aside.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Sir Winston Churchill described this as the terrible 20th century, and as far as the closing years of the century is concerned it seems to be a terrorist century. The debate has been dominated by Irish terrorism, but of course the IRA and the INLA are part of an international mafia of terror. Groups in different countries have widely varying ideologies but they do jobs for each other and they minister to each other's needs in terms of arms, explosives and training.

So I was very glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow (Sir J. Page) intervened in the Minister's speech to emphasise the need for closer European and wider international co-operation. This order is concerned with the situation in the United Kingdom, and we need this order. We need, unfortunately, in this exceptional situation, exceptional methods and measures.

I was very glad to hear the opening words of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), expressing his abhorrence of terrorism. If we will the end of safety of life and limb and property, we must be prepared to will the means. I cannot share the sympathy that has been expressed tonight—not for the first time—with one who ended up in confinement, having given a false name and failed to give any co-operation to the police. I am very sorry that he missed his Christmas, but other people died at Christmas.

Of course, this kind of legislation is repugnant, and I assure the hon. Member for Hammersmith that it is repugnant to Government Members too. Nor does the House in general deal with this kind of legislation lightly. It seems that we are constantly reviewing and renewing this legislation. We are jealous of civil liberties, but without life what is liberty?

This Prevention of Terrorism Act, as the Minister said, has been scrutinised and reviewed. I only regret that I have not yet had the time or opportunity to study fully the report of Sir Cyril Philips. It has been well pointed out by the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) that this legislation is not the product of a Conservative Administration.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): It is Jenkins' legislation.

Sir J. Biggs-Davison: Exactly—I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It is the product of a Labour Home Secretary, and the fact that he is now a member of the Social Democratic party is beside the point. This is a measure that then carried the support of all sides of the House. It was introduced by a Labour Home Secretary. His judgment then was sound. The views of chief officers of police were then taken, and those views have not changed. We would be very foolish indeed to disregard those opinions.

The question of carding has been mentioned in this debate by more than one hon. Member. It was the only part of the speech of the hon. Member for Hammersmith with which I agree. This does arouse resentment among the Irish and other people. It is important not to alienate those whose support, sympathy and co-operation is needed. But all Irishmen are not as he describes them. Unfortunately the IRA is organised in this island. I have been in pubs where there have been collections for the IRA. It is against the law. Therefore it is necessary sometimes for some Irish people to be troubled.

The great thing is that relations between Irish people and British people in this island are so good. Despite the atrocities that occur, there is no revulsion against Irish people as a whole. But there are some Irishmen who, unfortunately, must receive the attention of the police. My answer to the resentment that is caused by carding is that there should be identity cards for all, without discrimination. Some of us raised this issue when we were debating personation in Northern Ireland elections. We took the view that it was a way of dealing with that problem. This is the way to deal with so many problems. I should be grateful if Home Office and Northern Ireland Ministers would give some consideration to our suggestions from time to time.

I shall draw my remarks to an end, as time is short. I thought that the hon. Member for Hammersmith was not as charming this evening as he usually is. He seemed to be reading us a sermon. He was a bit patronising and prissy this evening. Some of us have been studying Northern Ireland affairs for some years. Some of us have even studied the sacred books on guerrilla warfare which he mentioned, such as the works of Marighella, Che Guevara, Mao and the rest. Some of us have engaged in a little study of these matters.

The speech of the hon. Member for Hammersmith and the decision of the Opposition to divide the House on the motion cause me much regret. I believe in constitutional government and a responsible, loyal Opposition. That is the basis of our democracy. What the hon. Gentleman has said and what the Opposition propose this evening are further proof that the Labour party has abandoned the path of responsible opposition and the role of alternative government.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The debate must end at half-past eleven and many right hon. and hon. Members wish to participate in it. I ask the House to follow the excellent example of the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison).

11.3 pm

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Despite the brief speech of the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison), I am sure that we have all noted that once again the serious problem that is before us is being debated late at night. The debate is too brief and too late. We are not able to deal adequately with the issue. It is clear that there are profound differences between us, and that is why there will be a Division. Those who are new to these debates will, I am sure, agree with me that it is easy in this place to air our prejudices. I hope that they will appreciate that to do so has an impact in Northern Ireland. Therefore, we should be careful about what we say.

The renewal of the 1984 Act was not expected until March, and it is unfortunate that the debate is taking place today, 21 February. Many Irish associations, individuals and organisations had decided to lobby the House in March but — [Interruption.] It is obvious that Conservative Members think that it is wrong to lobby the House. They do not really understand the serious problem that we are facing. They should appreciate that people have a right to come to this place to talk to Members about their feelings and about what is happening. The Irish community on the mainland has about 750,000 members. It includes those whose connections with Ireland are not those of individuals such as myself, whose families have been here for over 100 years. It includes those who have come hear from Ireland in recent years. The Federation of Irish Societies has profound feelings against the Act and Conservative Members should understand that. It feels that it bears down on them in a terrible way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that none of us wants anyone to be terrorised and hurt. At the same time, we want it to be understood that there are two sides to the debate. There are honourable differences and it does not pay anyone to laugh as though such feelings did not exist and the subject was not serious. We believe that the Act is misplaced and that the ordinary criminal law could deal with the problems that face us.

I understand that the Philips report is now available. I did not know that, and it appeared that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) did not either.

Many of us would have appreciated the chance to read the report prior to the debate. That was one of the reasons that caused me to think that it should have taken place at the normal time.

It is less than a year since the new Act came into force. The Federation of Irish Societies has sent documentation to all my hon. Friends and to me; I do not know whether it sent any to Conservative Members. It is the largest and most representative Irish organisation in Britain. It feels deeply about the legislation. It is worth considering why; it gives us some insight into what the Irish people here think about the Act.

We all deplore the killing and bombing that have gone on. None the less, we have to reach some kind of unity to try to solve this terrible problem. The Federation of Irish Societies believes that the Act is unnecessary and discriminatory, is divisive and threatening towards the Irish community and Irish citizens in this country, curtails civil liberties and is a constraint on legitimate political expression and activity. If the Act remains on the statute book, the federation would like some changes in it. Its requests embody its fears about what it thinks is wrong with the Act. It requests:

"That detainees be given immediate access to legal advice."

They do not have that. The federation also says that the Irish embassy should be notified when one of its citizens is arrested. It requests:

"That relatives of detainees be immediately informed of arrest and location of the detainee.

That detainees should not be held for more than 48 hours without being brought before a Court or a Justice of the Peace sitting in camera."

Another request which most of us should agree with is:

"That detainees not charged be compensated for 'social injury' defined as loss of reputation, loss of occupation/employment, domestic disturbance and community stigma . . .

That detained persons should have all rights and privileges generally afforded to unconvicted persons who are detained under the normal law."

The federation wants the ordinary judges rules to apply, and the withdrawal of the power to stop travellers at random without reasonable suspicion. All those requests are reasonable. They come from people who are fearful. They feel that they have been driven into an impasse because of this Act.

Mr. Canavan: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the most damning statistics in the Philips report is that more than 70 per cent. of the people who were arrested and detained under the Act were never charged? In other words, the Act is being used as a system of repression against innocent people.

Mr. Parry: I fully agree with the points that my hon. Friend has made on behalf of the Federation of Irish Societies. Does he also agree that when innocent people have been detained and then released without charges being made any fingerprints that have been taken by the police should be destroyed?

Mr. Flannery: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend. By the way, my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) says that the percentage he gave should have been 80, not 70.

The present Act has so consolidated the provisions of the previous legislation that it seems that we accept that the position will remain the same for ever. Effectively this exceptional law enlarges the circle of people whose civil liberties and legitimate political activities are constrained and threatened.

I was a member of the Committee which considered the 1984 Act. Labour Members fought strenously not only against the whole Bill but against the widening of the provisions. Arrest and detention powers were extended to cover international terrorism. I do not believe in the links that have been mentioned in the debate. When people are giving bombs to other people, they do not necessarily share the same ideals. Often they are opposed. There are no direct organisational links; there may be sporadic links.

The draconian powers of the Act hang like the sword of Damocles over the Irish community in this country. We, like Conservative Members, will fight tooth and nail to prevent bombs from exploding in the community because they harm all of us.

However, at any fixed moment, those of us in the Labour party who are deeply involved—and have been for years—are always trying to handle cases of people suddenly arrested without charge. My hon. Friends, wherever they may be, know about names such as Maire O'Shea, about all sorts of people who are being arrested and whose relatives get in contact with us asking us to do something. When we are in the process of doing it, those people are released, probably with a stigma. New names then come to us. That is going on all the time, as my hon. Friends would tell the House. People are taken from their homes and letters from relatives arrive asking us to deal with that. We hear of cases in Northern Ireland when people are killed by plastic bullets. All come to us to ask us to try to do something about it as best we can.

Innocent and orderly people are treated as criminals and then released without charge, with no compensation, but with a lingering stigma. They are shocked and terrorised and wonder what in heaven's name is happening to them in what must appear to them to be a nightmare of 1984 proportions.

One could develop that theme, but I should like to conclude by talking a little politics because there is an idea that the whole thing is hopeless. Most of us in the Chamber have debated the Act and its draconian sister, the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act, until a curious bond seems to exist between us. It is a strange thing, and I have tried to analyse it, and failed. I have often tried. But one thing is sure. We are permeated by its main components of intractability and sheer hopelessness. I have said over and over again that the sense of hopelessness proceeds from the fact that all that we talk about is security, and we never discuss what is the cause of the terrible problem that we all face together. That is why the Emergency Provisions Act and this Act will go on for ever if we do not discuss the root cause of why that is happening.

There is among us a dangerous acceptance of the permanency of the situation. We accept one another's position, and the two sides never discuss the politics of the situation except separately. The words "political initiative" have become dirty words instead of something that we want to do. There seems to be no meeting point at all. I cannot accept that, as I cannot accept this unjust Act. The emergency has gone on longer, much longer than both world wars put together, and the Boer war thrown in. Are we so powerless that we are all accepting defeat? I do not accept defeat, and meanwhile the situation that we have created between us inevitably spawns more violence.

I believe that ultimately the Unionists will have to accept their essential Irishness and be part of a united Ireland. The only way that the Emergency Provisions and the Prevention of Terrorism Acts will be unnecessary will be in a democratic and united Ireland living in peace and friendship with its neighbour, Britain. Some time, some day, we shall have to sit down and talk together. The British and Irish people are tired of an enduring slaughter that appears to be endless. They will ultimately demand that we do something. Our prejudicies are too luxurious and expensive. We shall have to act in unison for peace, and we shall not do so by passing the extension of the Act every year, as well as of the Acts kindred to it.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): I am as concerned about and as interested in the interests of individuals and their civil rights as anybody else in the House. I spend part of my time, or much of my life, as a barrister in the criminal courts, defending various people. But I equally believe that internaional terrorism is one of the major concerns that this country faces today, whether it comes from the acts in Northern Ireland or acts in the middle east.

I should like to make it clear what the order which the Opposition announced they propose to oppose again today, does. It does three things. It proscribes certain organisations, gives power to exclude people whom the Home Secretary has reason to believe are involved in terrorist offences and gives power to arrest and to question people whom the police have reason to believe are involved in the commission of criminal offences. Those are minimum powers, which we are justified in taking in defence of our nation and the people of this nation.

As has been said, the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Bill was introduced 10 years ago by a Labour Home Secretary. I do not believe that there have been any changes since then which mean that this legislation is less necessary today than it was 10 years ago. I should have thought that what happened in Brighton and in other parts of the world—with international terrorists wishing to make the streets and cities places to use their bombs to promote their causes—has made it clear to every hon. Member that the Act's limited powers are still necessary. I am satisfied by the assurance of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State that the police have made it clear throughout that they believe that these powers assist them in their fight against terrorism. I am sad that, yet again, the Opposition are choosing to oppose this measure.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): I do not intend to discuss the atmosphere that has given rise to terrorism and violence. If I were to do so, I would have harsh things to say about the House and its neglect over a long period in upholding democratic principles in Northern Ireland.

The Minister rightly said that the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976 represents a considerable infringement of civil liberties, and I welcome his recognition of that fact. The Home Secretary who introduced this measure described it as draconian. In that case one would expect that the Government would welcome serious questioning of the Act and that we would have had more time to debate it and more notice of when the debate would take place. What we have been given as a review of the Act during the past 12 months is an insult to the intelligence of the House. The person who carried out the review did so in only three weeks, according to his letter to the Home Secretary. He started his examination on 7 February and finished it on 15 February. How could a review of what is described as a considerable infringement of civil liberties be conducted in such a short period? The man who conducted the review did not consult, nor did he invite consultation, with, the responsible organisations which represent the Irish community and which are at the receiving end of this legislation.

The Minister questioned my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) when he talked about random arrests. About 84 per cent. of the people arrested under the Act are not charged with any crime. That is surely evidence that some random arrests are carried out. If people are arrested, that fact becomes publically known. If they are innocent, serious damage is done, even to the point of being made targets for an assassin's bullet. That is why we should seriously consider the operations of the Act.

No notice is required to be given to the relatives of any person arrested under the Act. A person could disappear off the face of the earth for seven days, and no one would know where he was. Under this Act, no one has any responsibility to tell his relatives about his arrest. That is a serious infringement of civil liberties. The simple answer is to create machinery to enable relatives to be informed of where their relations have been detained and to give the arrested person immediate access to a solicitor or other legal advice. What is the objection to doing that?

Frequent complaints have been made about the conditions in which many of these people—the vast majority of them innocent—have been held in custody. The Jellicoe review recommended that because of the Act's "draconian"—I use the review's word—native citizens detained under it should be, and should be seen to be, well treated. Will the Minister examine the conditions under which people have been held?

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): This debate has become predictable. All too often, I recall the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) lecturing hon. Members—especially those on the Government Benches—on approaching the matter with a cool mind. On a day when a Roman Catholic policeman has been butchered in Northern Ireland, following a weekend when a Roman Catholic prison officer was butchered coming from Mass, it is hard to isolate oneself from the emotions naturally provoked when we discuss terrorism.

As a constituency representative in Northern Ireland, I have lost too many friends and buried too many constituents to be removed from the emotional aspects of the Act. The hon. Gentleman has no difficulty about being passionate about housing, poverty or economics, so it ill becomes him to tell us that we should not be passionate when talking about the lives and deaths of people in this country. It is, rightly, an emotional matter. It is of prime importance to every citizen in this country. I have no doubt where my loyalties should lie—it is with those who could be done to death by acts of terrorism if it were not for the security forces being strengthened by the provisions contained in the Act.

It is the same sort of logic adopted by the party of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), which says that the RUC and the UDR should be disbanded, to leave the field free for the IRA all the easier to carry out its acts of murder and mayhem. It is the IRA which is most vociferous in its opposition to the Act. Does it not say something about the nature of the Act when the terrorist organisation wants it done away with?

The hon. Member for Hammersmith might say that the Act alienates some sections of the community. The Act does inconvenience many people — it inconveniences me. But, as a citizen who believes that terrorism must be put down, I am prepared to put up with that inconvenience if it helps some to live who might otherwise not live.

It is essential to put on the record the fact that the Minister has made it clear, and the security forces have made it clear, that the need for this legislation is as great as it ever was. When Labour Governments are prepared to take that advice from the security forces, it is strange that this Labour Opposition are not prepared to take that same advice from the same security forces.

There has been a significant act by the Government of the Republic of Ireland, and it should be taken into consideration. Any assistance that we can obtain from that Government in the fight against terrorism is to be welcomed. They took speedy action to seize funds that would have been used to buy guns, bullets and bombs in Northern Ireland. It is a step in the right direction, and we obviously look for more from that Government. While the Act is required, it must be supported by all right-thinking people.

Mr. Waddington: With the leave of the House, Mr. Speaker. I hope that hon. Members will acquit me of discourtesy if I do not deal with too many of the detailed points raised in the few minutes remaining to me.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) raised some important points. The Home Office circular to the police includes a careful explanation of the provisions of section 11. There have been no charges under that section since the Act came into force. On section 13, the circular does not go to immigration officers. Although it is rare for them to act as examining officers, nevertheless separate guidance is being prepared for them.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) mentioned the recent events in Ireland and questioned the adequacy of powers to control the movement of terrorist funds. The Government are certainly conscious that events in the Republic earlier this week make it necessary for us to consider our own powers. Section 10 has a far more limited purpose, and is not adequate to deal with the sort of situation which the Government of the Republic dealt with.

My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) mentioned identity cards. This has been debated on numerous occasions. I can see the force of what he said, but our advice is that it would not be very useful. When identity cards were abolished in 1952, the view of the police then was that they were no longer helpful, and I gather that the view of the police today is no different.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) said that there should be immediate access to legal advice for those detained under these powers. Under the present arrangements, access to a solicitor in England and Wales is governed by the provisions of the judges' rules and administrative directions to the police. These apply to those detained under the prevention of terrorism legislation in exactly the same way as to people in custody under other powers.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) highlighted the fact that the police want these powers. That is indeed true.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford) rose——

Mr. Waddington: I am sorry, but I must continue as only four minutes remain.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith asked whether the Act prevented terrorism. Clearly, we cannot prove that five more hotels would have been blown up had this Act not been on the statute book during the last year. We cannot prove that more of our colleagues would have been blown up had this legislation not been in force over the years since 1974. But we can exercise some common sense, as can the vast majority of people in this country.

Mr. Lloyd: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Waddington: The vast majority recognise that the detention of people, in respect of whom there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that they are involved in terrorism, and the exclusion of such people is much more likely to protect the community than harm us.

I was also asked whether the Act annoyed and alienated people in Northern Ireland and the Irish community here. Again, let us keep a sense of proportion. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley was right. How can we equate the inconvenience suffered by someone held up at a port, or the hardship of being detained for two or even seven days, with the sufferings of the families of those who have been murdered or the sufferings of two of our right hon. Friends? What would people think if this order was not carried tonight? What sort of message would go out from this House? They would think that we had all taken leave of our senses.

I suspect that the Labour party, by opposing the order, has already taken leave of its senses. This Act's predecessor was passed not just by a former Home Secretary who has since left the Labour party, but by a Labour Government. Until only two or three years ago, the Labour party was content to vote for the continuation of these powers year after year. The powers have not changed, and neither has the need for them. The only thing that has changed is the Labour party. It is now demonstrably composed of people, and is represented on the Opposition Front Bench by people, who are simply not fitted to exercise the power necessary for the protection of the people of this country.

11.30 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Minister's ridicule of the Labour Oppositon is wholly justified. The powers contained in this order are necessary and should be renewed. Regrettably, the Minister did not rely on the report of Sir Cyril Philips, which gave much greater support to the continuation of the powers than he allowed. All that needs to be said about this is what Sir Cyril Philips said: that the conviction of:

> "A large number of persons guilty of very serious criminal offences connected with terrorism which in many cases would not and could not have resulted from arrest under other powers" has taken place as a result of the enactment of this Bill last year. The Government must be supported, and in this year of all years, the alliance offers its support to the Government.

Question put:—

The House proceeded to a Division:—

Mr. Tony Lloyd (seated and covered.): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the Minister's reply he referred to the judge's rules and, I am sure, unintentionally, claimed in a way which misleads the House that there was no difference between the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and those of normal criminal law. I understand that under the Prevention of Terrorism Act a period of 48 hours elapses before a suspect is given access to a solicitor, and that the interview between the solicitor and the suspect can, at the insistence of the police, be conducted in their presence. That is different from what applies under the ordinary criminal law. If I am correct, can the Minister take steps to advise the House what the exact position is?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter which I can answer. I am sure that the Minister heard what the hon. Member said. If the hon. Member is correct, I am sure that the Minister will communicate with him.

The House having divided: Ayes 145, Noes 35.

PETITIONS

Torture

11.41 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I wish to present a petition to Parliament that supports Amnesty International's Campaign Against Torture. It contains 1,300 signatures, which were collected by Amnesty International's Epping Forest adoption group. It has handed similar petitions to all Members of Parliament in the locality.

The petition states:

To the Honourable The Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament Assembled The Humble Petition of the People of the United Kingdom showeth:

1) That we wish to register strong support for Amnesty International's Campaign Against Torture and declare our wish to see torture totally eradicated from the world.
2) That we believe that this end would be significantly advanced if all Governments implemented Amnesty International's 12-point programme for the prevention of torture.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House urges Her Majesty's Government

1) To support an effective United Nations Convention Against Torture and in particular compensation for torture victims to include anyone who has been the victim of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.
2) To support proposals both at the United Nations and at the Council of Europe to create an international commission to make unannounced visits to any place of detention.
3) To intercede whenever and wherever possible on behalf of prisoners being tortured.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

I share the views expressed in the petition and commend it to Parliament.

To lie upon the Table.

Human Embryos

11.43 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I wish to present a petition to Parliament on behalf of approximately 250 of my constituents in the Division of Teignbridge. The first signature on the petition is that of the organiser, Mr. Richard Wills, of 18 Gloucester Road, Newton Abbot, Devon.

The petitioners aver that the newly-fertilised human embryo is a real living individual human being, and they therefore welcome the statement in the Warnock report that "the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation".

They therefore oppose all such practices that are recommended in the report which discriminate against the embryo or violate its human dignity and right to life. They therefore urge the House to take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

Hon. Members present many petitions. Sometimes we agree with them and sometimes we do not. I support wholeheartedly the sentiments that have motivated the petitioners in this case. They conclude:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Liverpool

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): The purpose of this debate is to cut through the smokescreen of distortions that give the impression that Liverpool city council is responsible for present circumstances in Liverpool. We must consider the background.

I was born in a dock area before the war. My father was a docker, so I feel qualified to speak on some of the matters on which I hope to enlarge. I remember, as a young person, seeing around the pier head, the goree piazza and the Strand, shackled to the wall, bolts where slaves were tied up in the lucrative trade in human misery. The docks epitomise what is wrong in Liverpool — lack of investment of the profits created by Liverpool people. It is all very well for the Secretary of State for the Environment to talk about us whingeing and whining about our lot, but we are hard working people.

During the war and the national dock labour scheme from 1947 to 1964, my father used to stand in the pen with other dockers like a choice animal, waiting to be picked out for work. My father was proud, and characteristic of the spirit of people in Liverpool. We had dignity and got through decades of struggle. I have never known anything other than bad housing, high unemployment and lack of opportunity for Liverpool people. However, we have learnt lessons. One is that the ravages of the system to which we belong bleeds working people. Indeed, it is responsible for their death.

In 1965, the docks employed 13,589 people. That industry today employs 2,086 — a reduction of more than 80 per cent. There have been corresponding job losses in associated industries and services. There has been no let-up in the de-industrialisation of Liverpool. Between 1971 and 1981 the city lost 90,000, or one quarter, of its jobs. Manufacturing jobs have declined by nearly 40 per cent. and blue collar jobs by 30 per cent. Between 1979 and July 1983, 33,220 redundancies were notified by firms in Liverpool. The catalogue of job losses is endless.

Since 1979, the city has lost one third of its manufacturing jobs and half of the jobs in the city's largest industries—food, drink and tobacco. Between 1975 and 1982, the city council shed 4,400 jobs through natural wastage. The council is now the largest employer on Merseyside, providing socially useful jobs for 31,000 people. It employs one third of all public sector workers in the city. I have a list of 23 industries in which jobs have been lost. They include vehicles, metal goods, coal and petroleum, chemicals, electrical goods, leather goods, clothing and timber.

The latest figure of unemployment on Merseyside—100,000 — is an obscenity when it represents decent people who are eager to work. When they are provided with jobs by the council, they show that they can work.

Housing in Liverpool is believed to be among the worst and yet the most expensive in Europe. There are 22,000 people on the council's waiting list for houses. Urgent repairs are needed to 20,000 council houses. Liverpool has the highest percentage of old, privately rented houses in the country, with the exception of London. Its housing investment allocation has declined, in real terms, from £47 million in 1980 to £28 million in 1984-85. But the real decline in its housing investment allocation is highlighted by the fact that the city's allocation in 1980 was half that which it received in 1974. Since 1980 Liverpool has lost £63 million in housing subsidy. In 1980 the Government contributed £20 million to the city's housing services. In 1984 if fell to £5·5 million. The catalogue of crimes against the people of Liverpool goes on and on.

When the Labour party took control in Liverpool in 1983 we found that it was not only the public sector that had been decimated. The 10 years of decline in Liverpool under the Tories and the Liberals resulted in the axing of 1,000 local authority jobs, with vacancies in the council's establishment being left unfilled, the abolition of the direct labour organisation and the privatisation of certain services which resulted in job losses. This happened at a time when more, not fewer, jobs were needed in Liverpool. The rates increases since 1979 were used to compensate for Tory cuts in grants. None of that money was used for improvements in Liverpool. Liverpool city council could provide no cushion.

We have come a long way during the 20 months that the Labour party has been in power in Liverpool. We are proud of our achievements. At a time when unemployment is rising nationally, this is no mean feat. The 1983 general election which brought so many Conservative Members to this House has to be set against the Labour victory in Liverpool. It was the Labour party's first victory in Liverpool for 10 or 15 years. That landslide victory was continued in the local authority elections in 1984. Five out of the six Members of Parliament for Liverpool represent the Labour party. For the first time in 120 years there is not one Tory Member of Parliament for Liverpool. It indicates the trust of the people of Liverpool in the Labour party, both nationally and locally. It is proof that a socialist programme is not a liability at either national or local elections, as our opponents would have us believe.

What is even more important is that it has highlighted the political awareness of the people of Liverpool as a result of the experience of having the city run by Liberals and Tories, of having a Tory Government in power and the defections to the Social Democratic party. The turnround in the fortunes of the Labour party has been an inspiration to the city council and to workers in the Labour movement, both nationally and internationally. An opinion poll commissioned by Liverpool University showed that 73 per cent. of Labour voters, 62 per cent. of Liberal voters and even 48 per cent. of Conservative voters felt that the Government were largely to blame for Liverpool's problems.

During the last 20 months Liverpool city council has created 1,000 jobs. It has also prevented 1,000 job losses which had been inherited. It has also boosted employment in the private sector. By 1988, 17,000 jobs will have been created by the council's house-building programme and by its provision of sports facilities. There are 136 apprentices, and 100 sixteen-year-olds are on YTS schemes. Their wages have been topped up to £52 a week and they are guaranteed a job at the end of their training. We are introducing a minimum wage of £100 for local authority workers and a 35 hour week. During the last year 1,057 new houses have been built, and a further 1,211 are to be built in 1984-85. We have provided additional nursery accommodation and reorganised education in order to ensure that every child in Liverpool is provided with the best education that is available.

What is surprising is that with only 30,000 council houses estimated to be built in England and Wales in 1985, over 2,000 of these will be built in Liverpool—that is, one in 15. It is a testimony to the work that the Liverpool city council is doing and will continue to do, despite the opposition of the Government.

We are in a crisis in Liverpool at the moment; we face a financial crisis that is worse than last year's crisis. To balance the books we would require 6,000 redundancies or 220 per cent. rate rises. That is because of the 10 years of Tory and Liberal rule. The Government target of spending is totally unrealistic. The Government impose penalties for spending on essential services, and there is a totally inadequate rate support grant. The Government have reneged on their agreements of last July, when the Secretary of State, having toured the city's black spots, said:

"I have never seen housing conditions the like of those I have seen today."

Yet our resources for housing have been cut by 34 per cent.

This year the Tories have set us an arbitrary spending target of £220 million, yet we need to spend £270 million just to defend existing jobs and services. There will have to be a 220 per cent. rate rise or 6,000 jobs will go. Last year the Secretary of State said that it would be impossible to run the city with less than £245 million. With inflation, that would give us this year £255 million. But to maintain that we would have to put up the rates and every time the rates go up money goes off the rate support grant, creating an impossible gap for us to fill.

Since 1979 the Government have withdrawn £320 million from the city in rate support grant, housing improvement programme allocation, housing subsidy, and education grant. What we are saying in Liverpool is that we want that money back; it is as simple as that.

We have shown that our policies are working. Continually the Government chide the Labour Opposition with the question, "What did you do when you were in power?" In Liverpool we are creating jobs, we are building houses, we are building schools, and we are giving a high quality of education to people. In all those respects the Government are doing the opposite. We ask the Government to give us credit for having achieved success in creating jobs and for our services in housing and education. The cost of sacking 6,000 men would be felt by the Government in unemployment pay and lost taxes.

In the Liverpool city centre, 170 of the 680 stores have already shut, more "Closed" signs are going up and, with the rate increases forecast by the Government, more jobs will go in the Liverpool area. In addition to that, we are being threatened by the Government.

The Secretary of State visited Liverpool in 1984. He gave pledges. In a letter to the leader of the Liverpool city council he said:

"I can give you an assurance that I will do my very best to ensure your allocations in Liverpool next year under the housing investment programme and the urban programme. Taken together, they will enable the council to make positive progress in dealing with the city's severe needs."

He said that in Liverpool. He came down to London, reneged on his commitment and denied that he had ever made those statements, and he accuses us in Liverpool of violence. In Liverpool there is a concerted campaign, which includes violence to undermine the council. We say to the Liberals that they must share the responsibility, because they have not been prepared to denounce the violence or to dissociate themselves from those who are perpetrating it.

Having spoken about what he was going to do in Liverpool, the Secretary of State's latest pronouncement, reported in The Times of 19 February, is an indication that he has firm backing from the Cabinet to take direct action if the Liverpool administration is breaking down. We are well used to threats from the Minister, but this is the second time that the Cabinet have discussed the situation in Liverpool. The first time was in 1981, after the Toxteth riots, when the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), said that it took a riot to make the Cabinet take the problems of Liverpool seriously. Given the background and history that we have gone through in Liverpool, is that the only language that the Government understand when talking about the problems of places such as Liverpool?

Perhaps the Secretary of State is envisaging a Molesworth type raid in Liverpool. Perhaps he envisages dressing up in his predecessor's combat jacket. If he comes in the still of the night we shall be ready for him, whenever he comes. Why is he making attacks on us? Why has he launched the so-called investigation into town hall corruption and listed Liverpool as one of the places to be investigated?

Why was that announcement made? Why is he using the Local Government, Planning and Land Act, with threats of commissioners against us? We believe that this is a pre-emptive strike against the Liverpool city council and the Liverpool people. We also saw at the time he made that statement an announcement of concessions to four other local authorities which had been threatened with rate support grant cuts.

We have the support of the people of Liverpool, the trade unions and the people on the estates. We have seen the hypocrisy of this Government in this respect. But Liverpool exemplifies, perhaps in advance of other parts of the country, the processes which are taking place in this country today. The elected representatives of Liverpool will not let the people down. They have been let down too often in the past and they deserve better. We are not going to dirty our hands doing the Tories' butchery of jobs and services in an already ravaged Liverpool. As far as the Government's threats are concerned, it will not be dented shields they will have to deal with, because our shields were forged in preparation for the heat of struggle last year and those preparations are going ahead. The Government thought that we would go into battle then. To quote Mrs. Thatcher's soul mate, "You ain't seen nothing yet". Liverpool's people will not be crushed by this or any other Government.

12.1 am

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) on initiating this debate at this late hour. I have deliberately stayed behind to support him. I do not want to repeat the points he has already made because these have been put on record many times in the last couple of years. In fact, during the past six days three hon. Members from Liverpool have raised these matters. Last Friday my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) had the Adjournment debate on the future of the port of Liverpool. Then I raised the question of the Isle of Man-Liverpool crossing, and Monday of this week I made a Standing Order No. 10 application on the proposed loss of 300 jobs at Guinness, Liverpool. Tonight my hon. Friend has raised the general question of Liverpool.

We are fighting as Labour Members of Parliament for our constituents, our city and our area, and we shall continue to do so. The level of unemployment in Liverpool is merciless and indefensible. My hon. Friend said that more than 90,000 jobs had gone in the last few years. In fact, this Government have hit the jackpot because, with the loss of jobs in Cammell Laird and the Guinness company we have seen over 100,000 jobs go since this Government took office.

I am the Member for Riverside, which has the highest level of male unemployment in the United Kingdom—nearly 40 per cent. across the board. I warned in the late 1970s and the early 1980s about the problems arising in Toxteth and the grave danger of riots and disturbances on our streets. Unfortunately the warning was ignored and I say now that there will be trouble on our streets again unless the Government take action to reduce the massive level of unemployment. I believe that, as my hon. Friend said, this Government have seen nothing compared with what they will see if they allow mass unemployment to continue in city areas. Therefore, I hope that the Minister can give us some hope that we shall see a decrease in this terrible loss of jobs.

12.4 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): There was a rather telling slip in one of the things that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) said — that opponents regard a full-blooded Socialist programme as an election loser. His opponents on the Government Benches do not regard such a programme as an election loser; they regard it as wrong. The opponents of the hon. Member for Broadgreen are perhaps on the Front Bench on his own side of the House. It was an interesting slip because it showed how little the purpose of the hon. Member's speech was to debate with the Government.

The Government do not deny or dispute the long-term decline and the problems of Liverpool, or those of any other of the older industrial cities of this country. Those cities are no different from the older industrial cities in many other parts of Europe. I was in Bremen recently. We do not often associate declining industrial cities with Germany, but there is 20 per cent. unemployment in Bremen. There is a whole list of cities in Europe whose industries were based in the industrial past and which face the same sort of problems as Liverpool faces.

The debate between the hon. Gentleman and the Government, as opposed to that between himself and the Opposition Front Bench, is about the best response to the problems that are faced by Liverpool. Is the best approach to try to brand the city, through the city council, as one that is famous for municipal irresponsibility, for conflict and for delighting in the prospect of conflict, as we have heard from the hon. Gentleman? Is that the best way to help Liverpool in future? The answer—it comes with a resounding no from the Government—is that that is the worst way of trying to help Liverpool.

The Government have spent massive resources on Merseyside and Liverpool since they came to power. Over £1 billion a year has been spent by the Government on Merseyside since 1981-82, if all Government programmes are taken into account. If all Government programmes are considered, well over £400 million has been spent in Liverpool this year.

Let us consider housing. The very problems which are so real in Liverpool—the hon. Member has described them and no one will dispute his description — stem from the policies and mistakes, which are now being repeated. The construction of huge municipal housing estates in inhuman styles with no basis for real communities created the problems that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues draw to our attention. They go back over many years.

Mr. Parry: To pre-war years.

Mr. Waldegrave: As the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) says, many of the problems may stem from pre-war years. Many of them have come from the great post-war municipal housing boom. The hon. Member for Broadgreen proposes to compound the mistakes of past years by pouring more municipal money into the city in exactly the same way. Why is it that the new Labour city council, since its election, has rejected all the imaginative schemes involving private capital, co-operatives and the ingredients that we have seen so successfully applied in Stockbridge village, Minster court and elsewhere? Those are forward-looking and imaginative schemes, which hold out some hope of finding a way forward. They do not involve a programme that merely redoubles the municipal housing of the past. The policies that the hon. Gentleman is trying to repeat were those that caused many of the problems with which he is allegedly trying to deal.

The Government said last year that within the constraints that would be placed upon them—I refer to the next sentence of the letter of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, which the hon. Member for Broadgreen did not quote the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to provide a reasonable urban aid programme and a reasonable allocation for Liverpool would have to come within the general contraints on public expenditure. Within those constraints my right hon. Friend has provided an allocation for 1985-86 for the inner city partnership on Merseyside as a whole of about £24·1 million. Bids for 1985-86 are still being considered but it is likely that Liverpool city council's share will be about the same as last year, about £20 million. Giving the constraints that lie on the Government, that is not a bad record. There are many other cities that are aware of the resources that are being poured into Liverpool and they wonder whether it is worth while. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to spend not his money or Liverpool's money. It behoves him to remember that the money that he wants to spend comes from taxpayers and ratepayers elsewhere in the country.

There has been a wide range of other Government expenditures. I have mentioned some from my own Department but it is worth remembering that there is a huge range of others. The Department of Health and Social Security will spend about £127 million this year on hospital and community health services. The Department of Trade and Industry will spend about £24 million on grants and expenditure on industrial investment. The Manpower Services Commission will spend £42 million.

It is not a lack of Government resources that lies at the heart of Liverpool's problems. The difficulties go back to far deeper structural problems. A problem that has been added unnecessarily to the structural problems is the attitude of the city council. Its policies are almost designed to drive away private investment and to produce conflict and despair.

The hon. Member for Broadgreen referred wrongly to the Secretary of State making threats against Liverpool; he verged upon extraordinary language. What the Secretary of State did recently was merely to remind Liverpool city council, as it needs to be reminded from time to time, of the law on capital allocations. The city council originally spoke of extravagant proposes incapable of being financed. I have information from meetings today that it has drawn back from a programme that could not have been financed and is saying that its programme for this year will be met within the legal allocation. If that is so, it is much to be welcomed, and I hope that it will be matched by a drawing back from any illegality in regard to the setting of the budget. Nothing could be more designed to damage the provision of jobs and investment in Liverpool than the city council taking the city through a whole charade of conflict over the budget such as we had last year.

I think the House had assumed that it heard all it needed to hear on the problems of Liverpool's budget last summer. It might have been assumed that the city council would have learned a lesson from last year's experience. I hope that I am proven to be wrong but it seems that those assumptions could be wrong. We are dealing with a council that does not respect the normal traditions of responsible local government. The council persists in claiming, as the hon. Member for Broadgreen claimed, that Liverpool has lost rate support grant on the assumption that the grant should be fixed for all time at the level of 1979-80. That is plainly nonsense. The suggestion that the city council has been harshly treated is scarcely borne out by the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement. The council's target, at £222 million, is a 2·3 per cent. increase on its 1984-85 adjusted budget. Some authorities have been asked for a 1·5 per cent. cut. The council's grant-related expenditure has risen by £19 million, or 9·6 per cent., to £217 million. This is the third highest GRE for any metropolitan district. The block grant that the council would receive for spending at target has increased by £3 million, or 2·5 per cent., to £118 million. So, if the council operates responsible financial policies, it can draw very substantial support from the taxpayer.

Nevertheless, the council is again threatening not to make a proper rate. I cannot stress too strongly that the consequences for Liverpool will be far worse if the council does that rather than accepts its proper statutory responsibilities. If no rate is made, who will provide the services on which so many depend? Who will pay the council staff? Even if, as last year, the council eventually sees the folly of its threat, the people of Liverpool will have suffered further months of needless anxiety and the reputation of the city will have suffered a further knock.

Let me make the Government's position clear. We do not deny the gravity of Liverpool's problems, but these must be tackled by responsible and legal action rooted in the real world——

Mr. Parry rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not giving way. As the hon. Gentleman will see, I have very little time left.

As I was saying, the problems must be tackled by action rooted in the real world and not in some fantasy world of political rhetoric, where money is alleged to grow on trees and where the law is to be set aside if it suits the council to do so.

The hon. Member for Broadgreen referred to violence. If one wanted to use this great debating Chamber as a way of reaching people and saying a few things to damage Liverpool, one should make the predictions of violence that the hon. Gentleman made tonight. We know, and he knows, that the enormous majority of people in Liverpool would repudiate such attitudes. It is the raising of such scares and the scarcely concealed glee with which the hon. Gentleman spoke of conflict that do such damage to Liverpool.

I have every confidence that the people of Liverpool will have more sense. If they do, they will have done much more for their future than will the overheated and rather trivialising rhetoric we have heard from the hon. Member for Broadgreen.

The Question having been proposed after Ten o'clock on Thursday evening and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at fifteen minutes past midnight.

PETITION

University College Hospital, London (Tinnitus Clinic)

9.35 am

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I have the honour to beg leave to present a petition concerning the tinnitus clinic at University College hospital. It is signed by Mr. Jack Shapiro and 71,025 others They express their deep anxiety about the possible closure of the clinic and the desperate need to keep it open.

The petition reads:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled:

The humble petition of the British Tinnitus Association acting under the auspices of the Royal National Institute for the Deaf.

Sheweth that the tinnitus clinic at University Clinic hospital, London WC1 is under threat of closure as a result of the withdrawal of funding by Bloomsbury district health authority.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will take such steps as may be necessary to ensure that the tinnitus clinic will remain open and so continue its diagnostic treatment and research facilities which are of benefit to tinnitus sufferers throughout the United Kingdom.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Orders of the Day

Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.37 am

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It may be for the assistance of the House if I start by explaining what I propose to cover in my speech. First, I propose to set the Bill in the context of the computer software market in western Europe and in Britain as it is now and as all projections suggest that it will grow during the next five or six years. Secondly, I propose to analyse the development of Government and public policy over the past decade or so and to show why it is necessary to deal with this problem on its own without waiting for more general legislation, which I believe the Government contemplate at some stage. Thirdly, I propose to analyse some of the difficulties which exist under the law as it is believed currently to stand, there being considerable uncertainty among lawyers about exactly how the law stands. Thereafter, I wish to move on to the consequences for the industry of the present state of the law and the difficulties of enforcement. I shall then deal with the measures that the industry is taking to deal with some of its problems.

Whatever the industry does, it will still be faced with its first and most fundamental difficulty, which is the absence of a sure copyright law in this area. I propose to analyse how this problem is being tackled by our principal trading partners and the major countries that are involved in computer programming. I then propose to analyse the Bill, concentrating on how it is proposed to enforce it. I shall deal finally with the prospects for the industry if this measure is passed.

I begin by dealing with the size and scope of and prospects for the industry, because this sets the context in which the measure must be seen. In 1983 more than $61 billion—nearly £61 billion on the current exchange rate —was spent on data processing in western Europe. About 57 per cent. was spent on external products and services and the remainder was spent on data processing staff and overheads. The software and services segment of this market was worth more than $12 billion in 1983 and —this is the crucial point—it is expected to grow on average by no less than 22 per cent. per annum between now and 1989. By any standards, this must be one of the most dynamic sectors of our economy.

In 1983, processing vendor services had 39 per cent. of the market, but this proportion is expected to decline by 1989 to less than 25 per cent. The composition of the market is changing. There is likely to be a rapid growth in the software sector. The software sector had a 28 per cent. share of the market in 1981 and a 38 per cent. share in 1984. On current projections, its share is expected to grow to no less than 57 per cent. by 1989.

In 1981 the total value of sales of software in western Europe was $1·3 billion. By 1989 it is expected to grow to approximately $7 billion. That effectively means that sales will multiply 2·5 times between now and 1989. This market is growing at a staggering rate. In 1983 independent suppliers of package software and custom software had 27 per cent. of the market, but this share will grow by 24 per cent.—higher than the average expected rate of growth—between now and 1989. For the small houses this projected growth in the market is little short of dramatic.

We are dealing with a dynamic market. On a national basis, taking the western European market as a whole, France offers the best opportunities, with projected growth of 23 per cent. Projected growth in Germany is 18 per cent., in the United Kingdom 16 per cent. and in Italy 11 per cent. This point is important, because in the past Great Britain has always been assumed to be the world leader in software packaging. We are in a state of substantial decline compared with our major competitors. One of the main purposes of the Bill is to ensure that we return to our position as world leader.

The basic legislation governing copyright is the Copyright Act 1956. Clearly the world has changed a great deal during the past 30 years. Many products that are commonplace today were unimaginable 30 years ago. From time to time, Parliament has had to extend the conditions of the Copyright Act to cover new products. For example, two years ago the legislation was extended to cover video material. My Bill seeks to extend the cover to computer software, which was barely understood 30 years ago as having any prospects.

It was plain that the 1956 Act would have to be revised. In March 1977 the Whitford committee, led by Mr. Justice Whitford, produced a report, Cmnd. 6732, paragraph 486 of which stated:

"The demand for clear and effective protection has increased as the programming industry has grown."

The report went on to analyse how it has been long recognised that copyright is the most appropriate intellectual property right for the protection of computer programmes. Mr. Justice Whitford concluded in paragraph 489:

"Having considered the issues involved we are strongly of the opinion that there is a need for clear and effective protection. Accordingly we recommend that all computer programmes and software which have involved a sufficient degree of skill and/or labour to be considered as works in the normal copyright sense and which have been reduced to writing or other material form should be clearly and effectively protected against copying."

As a result of the report's publication, the Government started consultation on general reform of the law on copyright. I must point out that Mr. Justice Whitford's committee considered more than just the protection of computer software; it considered the updating and modernising of the law generally.

In 1981 the Government issued a Green Paper entitled "Reform of the Law relating to Copyright, Designs and Performers' Protection", Cmnd. 8302. Paragraph 2 of chapter 8 concluded:

"It may be questioned whether copyright is the right vehicle for the protection of programs. However, as Whitford remarked, it is probable that programs are already protected under the 1956 Act and the Government accepts that there is much to be said for dealing with programs under copyright law, since the essential need is for protection against copying. To remove any uncertainty that may exist it is proposed to make explicit in new legislation that computer programs attract protection under the same conditions as literary works. In these circumstances considerations such as term and ownership and, indeed, the basic question of whether a program possesses sufficient originality to attract copyright protection will apply to programs in the same way as to other copyright works."

The process of consultation continues.

The Information Technology Advisory Panel, which reported in 1983, said:

"Copyright legislation is a fundamental building block in the infrastructure of the information business. . . . We would stress the crucial importance of copyright legislation to future economic activity. it is essential that the (Copyright) Bill now being proposed should take account of the web of developments that have been described in the Report"— that is the Green Paper—

"in order to provide a secure legal foundation for the information business to the year 2000 and beyond and we urge all interested parties to give the subject close and continuing attention."

The Government have not been able to publish a Bill on that matter. May I explain why? It is in the fundamental interest of the industry that common standards be obtained among our trading partners. In considering the modernisation of any copyright law, it is necessary to take into account not only the developments in the United Kingdom since 1965 but to secure a common approach to the problem with our major trading partners. As I understand it, the Government have not been consulting solely with interested parties in the computer software industry and other aspects of copyright law reform, but are having to consult with our European partners to obtain, as far as is possible, a common approach to the whole problem.

The House will be aware that many of the major firms involved in this industry are trading not just in the United Kingdom but throughout the Common Market and the rest of the world. Nothing could be more harmful to the development of the industry than to have different laws applied in different countries. Although reform is necessary, it is essential that that reform be not rushed if, as a consequence of taking the matter slowly, properly and sensibly, we can obtain much wider reform than would be possible if we were dealing within our own national context.

I shall deal with some of the problems caused by piracy in the software industry. It is appropriate to start this part of my speech by saying that it is impossible to state with precision and complete accuracy the extent to which piracy exists in our coutry. That it is substantial is undoubted. I shall give some evidence—there is a mass of evidence for anyone who wishes to study it — that I think accurately reflects the best judgment of the dangers and weaknesses in the present law.

The evidence begins with a survey conducted by Dr. Elsom of the University of Aston which was published in the spring of 1982. That study revealed that approximately one in four microcomputer software houses were suffering from what they regarded as a serious loss from unauthorised copying of their software by users and/or piracy by software dealers.

In 1984, a study by Newcastle polytechnic revealed that the proportion of companies conscious that their programmes had been pirated had risen to a staggering 56 per cent. It would be a bold man who would say that one year after the publication of the Newcastle polytechnic survey that proportion had declined. It is an almost inevitable inference from the evidence that is accumulating week by week that it is growing, not declining.

At my request, following publication and First Reading of this Bill, Dr. Elsom returned to the same sources to find out what had happened to the companies that he surveyed in 1982. Whereas in 1982 25 per cent. of the microcomputer business software developers were unaware that unauthorised copying of their products was taking place, he found that 37 per cent. of the 27 companies that he had identified in his survey — 10 altogether — had gone into liquidation or were untraceable. A further company which was unable to survive on its own had been taken over. Of the remaining 16, three had become purely retailers of software and had ceased development, three companies were in the process of taking or had taken legal action against those who had been pirating their products, and another three had to confess that they were unable, although they wished to do so, to take legal action because they could not afford expensive actions in the civil courts to try to establish their title. That is a depressing follow-up from the 1982 survey.

In the past three months a whole range of companies, from the largest to the smallest, have approached me with evidence of what has been happening to their companies. As it is fundamental to my case that software piracy is occurring in all sections of the software industry, from the highest to the lowest, from commercial and business software of the £1 million-plus scale to the smallest computer game available in any house, I shall give three examples—I believe them to be representative samples of the type of evidence that has come before me —so that the House may have some idea of how the problem is affecting individual companies. I do not propose to name the companies involved. I assure the House that they have all approached me in confidence and I am prepared, in confidence, to pass on the information which has come to me.

The first of the three examples is a company with a turnover in the United Kingdom of approximately £10 million per year. Its managing director estimates that for every authorised copy of his software on the market there are two unauthorised copies. His company is owed £1 million by one software pirate who has been identified. The managing director estimates that the total loss of revenue from lost royalties and sales during the past nine years of that pirate's activities is more than £2 million. At the turn of the decade, 1979-80, that company was hoping to expand substantially into providing educational software. When I use that term, I stress that I am not talking about educational software which will teach children in schools and youngsters in colleges the technique of using a computer, but rather software that can become a substitute for and often a great improvement on the textbooks which are otherwise available for the teaching of academic subjects in schools.

That company wished to move into that area, but the managing director has found that it is impossible because of the ease with which the material can be copied. He has withdrawn, and is now concentrating all his activities on operating systems software which can be protected by post-sales maintenance. When it becomes necessary to maintain the hardware involved, he can discover what software is being used and has some idea whether it has been pirated. That is a self-protection technique which more and more companies are having to use. It is thoroughly dangerous for the development of the industry because more and more of the major houses are having to turn in on themselves and to rely not just on their own hardware but on their own software. It is the familiar argument that the House is used to hearing of free trade against protection.

My contention is that the best opportunities and the best prospects of growth for this industry will exist if there is a free interchange of trade between hard and software and not the development of software which will be exclusive to the manufacturer's hardware where it becomes impossible to use that software on another company's hardware. That would be a very dangerous development for our industry and would ensure that we missed out entirely on the international opportunities which are currently open to us if we are able to put our own house in order.

The company was employing fewer than 10 people at the start of the decade. The managing director had hoped by now, with the opportunities and plans that he had at the start of the decade, to be employing 100 or more people, but because of piracy he has had to curtail virtually all the growth that he intended and to restrict himself to a limited range of services in order to protect himself as closely as possible. If ever there was a case of lost opportunity, that is an example of it.

I have been told by a second firm — a major international software company producing business programmes — that for every authorised copy of its software available in the market there are between three and eight unauthorised copies. It is an international company trading across the world. That has resulted in lost sales and royalties of more than £600 million during the past two or three years. The company believes that piracy has affected its export markets, and it is now only distributing software containing measures designed to prevent users and dealers from copying it. Thus, in the clearest possible way, piracy has had an effect on the manner in which the company develops and distributes its software. It is an appalling tale. It is a problem that extends across the world, and I shall deal with it in a moment.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The hon. Gentleman has mentioned two quite large firms, particularly the second one. Does he agree that, whereas large firms may well have the resources to police the market place, and even to change direction or to feed in certain security devices, the problem is much greater for smaller firms which have no such resources, so that in their case software theft can kill them off?

Mr. Powell: The hon. Member is correct. One of the conclusions that I ask the House to draw from my analysis is that the large firms are always able to raise the cost to the pirate of breaking the protection for the software system. Therefore, with the large firms there is an escalation of cost, between the manufacturer and the pirate, in the breaking and copying of the system. The small firms do not have the necessary resources. There has been a sharp decline in the number of houses writing their own software and commissioning software from independent agents. The evidence suggests that in 1983 there were about 500 houses dealing in that section of the market. By the end of 1984 the number had declined to about 350 as firms had gone out of business altogether and as other firms had ceased to commission outside software from independent agents. That has resulted in a decline in the number of people writing software programmes during the past 15 to 18 months. The brunt of that decline has been at the lowest end of the market. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing the matter so clearly to the attention of the House.

[Mr. Powell]

What we are doing is no more and no less than what has taken place and is and will be taking place in other countries. Therefore, although we may not take action at the same moment as other countries, we shall soon find ourselves with broadly parallel laws, which will be to Britain's immense advantage.

I have said that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire introduced a Bill under the ten minutes rule. As one would expect from its origins, that Bill was most professionally drafted. Hon. Members frequently claim that the legislation that comes before the House is indigestible and incomprehensible because it alludes to earlier statutes into which we have to substitute words which we cannot find and which, if we can, we then find are virtually incomprehensible.

I know that my hon. and learned Friend will not regard what I am about to say as disrespectful. Since his introduction of a Bill under the ten minutes rule the matter has been reconsidered. Assistance has been given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology and the Under-Secretary of State and the Bill has been drafted with the assistance of parliamentary counsel. Those gentlemen are frequently the object of substantial criticism for producing incomprehensible legislation. For once, if only for once, they have produced a triumph of clarity and brevity. Nothing could be easier than the Bill. Clause 1(1) provides:

"The Copyright Act 1956 shall apply in relation to a computer program (including one made before the commencement of this Act) as it applies in relation to a literary work and shall so apply whether or not copyright would subsist in that program apart from this Act."

I hope that for once the House will join me in praise of the parliamentary counsel who have managed to produce it.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to that point. Might it have something to do with the fact that the Statute Law Society gave a prize for the redrafting of a Bill which was won by someone who redrafted the Copyright Act 1956? If that is so, does he not welcome the beneficial results?

Mr. Powell: My hon. and learned Friend is right. If ever there were a pilot scheme which should lead to a much wider scale of opportunities and prizes, surely that was it.

Clauses 2 and 3 bring into effect the provisions of the Copyright Act 1956 for computer software programmes. It will be possible to apply to magistrates for a search warrant—a crucial power of law enforcement. In that I am following the scheme which was adopted two years ago by my noble Friend Lord Eden of Winton in his private Member's Bill which extended the law of copyright to cover video programmes.

The scheme of things under the Bill is identical to that in the legislation passed two years ago. That Act has been one of the most successful ever passed in modern times. The industry faced colossal problems and action was taken perhaps later than it should have been so that the problems were aggravated, but it is estimated that the legislation has eliminated two thirds of illicit and unlawful piracy. Given the ease of copying, much will inevitably never be stopped. The Bill is not designed to prevent copying for personal use at home, although I hope that people will be alerted to the moral implications of copying other people's property, but it is designed to make life as difficult as possible for those who pirate and copy works and then sell them at a fraction of the true cost.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): As my hon. Friend has said, technical development in the computer software industry is moving very rapidly. I understand that the Bill will cover the pirating of existing software, but will it cover developments in methods of which we are now unaware but which may occur in the technological progress of the next few years?

Mr. Powell: I am grateful for that intervention. All the advice that I have received is that the Bill will be sufficient for that purpose, but I believe that the Government will be introducing further copyright legislation in due course so that if the Bill proves inadequate in any way we shall have the opportunity to review it. At present I merely seek sufficient power to deal with the overwhelming bulk of commercial piracy in this country, and all the evidence that I have received suggests that the Bill will do that.

The video amendment to the Copyright Act has been successful because a special body of people has been established to police it. The video industry came together in the Federation Against Copyright Theft and established a small unit of highly qualified people to investigate piracy and present evidence to the police. The matter is then subject to ordinary police inquiries as in any other criminal case. That system has worked extremely well and I pay tribute to the director general of FACT, Mr. Bob Birch, a former solicitor with the Metropolitan police, and to Mr. Peter Duffy, a former commander in the Metropolitan police. They have established a first-rate unit working closely with police forces throughout the country, collecting and collating evidence of criminal activities and bringing it to the attention of the police. The police then apply for search warrants and make arrests if the evidence justifies it. The police conduct a perfectly normal criminal investigation and bring charges if there is evidence of crime. None of that is done by the special unit, which merely collates the evidence and puts it to the police. The Federation Against Software Theft would wish to act in exactly the same way, to employ people highly qualified in this kind of work and to operate in the closest possible collaboration with constabularies throughout the country to ensure that criminals are brought to justice. Evidence from police officers shows how well the system is working with FACT.

Clause 3 provides for the penalties. At the moment there are no criminal penalties, but if the Bill is passed the penalties will be the same as for any other breach of the Copyright Act—a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment on trial by indictment, and unlimited fines. That will be a substantial deterrent. The pirates will find their activities ever more closely monitored by experts, there will be a substantial risk of prosecution and the penalty will not be a £40 fine under the Trade Descriptions Act or prolonged civil proceedings at escalating cost which at present prevents so many firms from taking action.

The single most important thing that we can do to help the industry to develop and to prosper is to extend the Copyright Act. That is why I have taken so long to outline the reasons for the Bill and to lay before the House an analysis of the evidence. I am confident that if the Bill becomes law all the possibilities for the industry will be put into forward gear, bringing growth, new jobs, new export potential and new wealth for this country. Without it, there will be increasing piracy, further bankruptcies, reduced commission and wasted prospects. I am sure that the House would not countenance such a prospect.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): First, I apologise for the fact that I shall have to leave at about 12.30 and thus may not be present when the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) sums up. I congratulate him on a comprehensive speech packed with interesting information and powerful examples to show the necessity for the Bill, which I strongly welcome. I also congratulate him on coming fairly high in the ballot for private Members' Bills, which we all enter half hoping to come high and half hoping not to come high because we realise how much time it takes to handle a Bill of this kind. I entered the ballot hoping to come high specifically to introduce this type of legislation. It was thus a particular pleasure to hear the hon. Member for Corby introduce his Bill so cogently and powerfully. As the hon. Gentleman generously said, the foundations for the Bill were laid by the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), to whom I also pay tribute — indeed, it was his ten-minute Bill that encouraged me to pursue the matter myself.

If Britain is to maintain her prosperity we shall have to establish a new base for that prosperity and a new kind of industry. I believe that the whole House is aware of that. I have long believed that we shall have to move away from the old high-resource use, relatively low value-added industries and away from Britain's old traditional base towards a new sort of base, or towards what might be called a low-resource use, high value-added industry.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): That is highly original.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) wish to intervene, because I would gladly give way to him? I gather that he does not want to intervene. He just did so, as usual, from a sedentary position.

That is the economic base that we shall have to encourage. We shall have to make use of our human and intellectual property much more effectively in future if we are to develop that base and that sort of wealth for the future. The software industry is pre-eminently that sort of industry. It converts intellectual capacity, brainpower and ingenuity into wealth. It is a classic example of a low-resource use, high value-added industry that turns brainpower into money. It is also a classic example of an industry that has, and will continue to have, a thriving small firms sector that feeds into the larger software houses.

Perhaps this industry is the 20th or 21st century successor to the old cottage industry. It is conducive to being centred away from the big cities, and people can work from their own homes. It is something much to be encouraged. As the hon. Member for Corby has said, we are very good at it in Britain, or at least we were. We were once world leaders. Indeed, I still believe that in terms of ingenuity of software packaging and production we are as good, if not better than anyone else in the world. But as the hon. Member for Corby pointed out, our industry, while not perhaps in total decline, is certainly not progressing as it used to do.

One reason for that is that much of Britain's brainpower has a habit of translating itself abroad. Recently, I went round Silicon Valley in America and discovered that the highest proportion of non-Americans there is accounted for by British expatriates. There are even more British expatriates there than Hispanics and most of them are involved in the software business.

However, we are good at producing software, as we have proved in the past. We already have an industrial sector in Britain that is to be encouraged by any means that we can find. I know that the Minister, the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), who is not at present in his seat, is very keen to do that. I have some doubts of a broader nature about the Government's policy for developing that sector properly. Indeed, I have some doubts about whether they are encouraging it and developing it in the way that they might do. But that is a matter for a different debate.

There are two barriers to the proper development of this most important sector of our industry. One barrier is looming and yet to come, but the other already exercises a profound and doleful influence over the industry. I hope that we shall debate the barrier yet to come in a month or so. I refer to the application of the licensing requirements for the export of software abroad under the new COCOM regulations. How they will apply, how they will affect the market, and how we are to honour the commitments apparently laid on us are matters of deep concern for the industry. But with any luck they are again a subject for a future debate. I hope that the Government will grant that debate, because the implications of that agreement are profound for that sector of the market.

The barrier that is here, and here with a vengeance—and which the Bill tackles with great effect—involves software theft. I have said that it is a barrier to the development of the industry, because it establishes a black market that unbalances the whole industry. The rewards for the production of intellectual property accrue not to those responsible for it, or to the inventor or designer, but to the pirates. It is they who get the profits. The black market is also highly developed. The hon. Member for Corby said that we had perhaps let the piracy of video tapes go on for too long, as that also involves a highly developed black market. Although I very much welcome this Bill, one could always say that one might have hoped for its introduction even sooner.

According to most reliable calculations, we are losing about £150 million a year to the software pirates. There is a fully established black market distribution system. As FAST has reminded us and as I think the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire mentioned, a person can go to Blackbushe market and find such items sold perfectly openly and in some volume. Backing up that distribution system is a sophisticated production mechanism. Again, I think that the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire mentioned that in at least one case—and no doubt in others—people have been known to have factories specifically for piracy purposes, and the reproduction of software.

Furthermore, piracy is not confined to one sector. It spans the whole industry, from the high-price, relatively low-volume software right down to the computer games area. The pirates are even sophisticated enough to make some minor changes to the product that use somebody else's intellectual property, and to add certain things to it that give it a new characteristic and perhaps appeal. In all those senses, we are talking about tackling a highly developed black market. It is large, and growing every day. In a sense, it is perhaps a cancer that sits in the industry, preventing the proper development of the industry and robbing people of their rightful rewards.

That must be stopped to the benefit of British industry and to the benefit of the development of this country's intellectual property. But as the hon. Member for Corby has said, there are problems about stopping it. The problem about software theft is that it is easy. It does not seem like theft. To copy a programme, the person merely has to sit down at his computer, call up his copy programme, touch the button and there it is. That does not seem like theft. There is no break-in or anything clandestine. It can be done at home. I recognise, of course, that the Bill is directed not towards the casual copier at home but towards the commercial pirate, but that is how simple it is.

The problem is that, because we have ceased to treat the matter seriously, many people who would not dream of stealing a piece of hardware would nevertheless think that the copying of software is somehow not theft. But theft it assuredly is. It is the theft of somebody else's intellectual property. The Bill provides a framework enabling that point to be made.

I think that the hon. Member for Corby probably made the case more powerfully than I can, but it should not be believed that legislation will solve the problem. In itself, it will not. The hon. Gentleman used the word "policing". As he is a lawyer, I was surprised to hear him say that. He went on to say that it was the police who did the policing. But a back-up organisation is needed, as with video piracy. A back-up organisation is needed to police or scrutinise the Bill effectively so that it can be operated in the way that the hon. Gentleman intends. It must be remembered that that is what, under a similar piece of legislation, has reduced video piracy by two thirds since 1983.

I pay tribute to FAST for what it has done to bring this matter so effectively, and in a very responsible way, before the House. I also pay tribute to it for providing us with a back-up system with which to scrutinise the Bill's operation.

This is an important Bill. As the hon. Member for Corby said, it is a Bill to protect property, investment and jobs. It will help to provide a framework for creating new jobs, new wealth and prosperity. It is an important component in a new strategy for the industrial regeneration of Britain. It is a vital component since it addresses itself to a vital sector of industry. I am happy to welcome the Bill. I hope that it will progress as fast as possible and become legislation as quickly as possible.

10.50 am

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), the Minister and the House because I shall probably have to return to my constituency before the end of the debate, although I shall listen to as much of it as I can. I welcome the Bill and I intend to do everything that I can to help my hon. Friend with the Bill's further stages.

Once again we are trying to legislate in the face of a technology which leaps ahead of us all the time. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby and the hon. Member for Yeovil were right to argue that the Bill should be considered not in isolation, but within the broader context of copyright. I declare an interest as an author and playwright and one who hopes to see some of his work translated to software.

One cannot but be worried by the many copyright problems which remain. The literary copyright involved in books is pirated throughout the world. Pirated copies of paperbacks are to be found everywhere. The video piracy problem was one of enormous proportions. When we legislated it was estimated that about 70 per cent. of videos sold in Britain were pirated. We legislated just in the nick of time.

We should be able to look to a back-up organisation. I support the work done by the Federation against Software Theft and Mr. Maclean. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to explain the Government's view of the wider copyright question, how we should seek to keep in touch with technology and the difficulty of producing legislation which encompasses the leaps ahead in technology. I am thinking in particular of the role of the World Intellectual Property Organisation. That has been set up to try to deal with some of the problems. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about the prospects for an international convention. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby described some vivid examples of international competition.

I shall highlight some of the existing problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby spoke about legislation running parallel in other countries. I welcome that, but some anxieties remain. For example, Australia is regarded as the piracy capital for software mainly because a recent case resulted in the decision that computer software does not fall within Australian copyright law. Australia seems to have greater freedom in that respect.

Mr. William Powell: That case caused appalling problems but the Federal Parliament intervened and legislation was passed. The original decision was reversed and the law has now been straightened out in Australia.

Mr. Marshall: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. I was sure that he would be able to help. However, it is a simple matter to take software out of the country. For example, it can be put in an envelope and posted to Australia. If the software is then adapted, the law is uncertain. Software which is adapted, even marginally, can be sent back here and may not be covered by copyright law. The role of Governments in such matters is important and I hope that the Minister will say something about it.

I have declared my interest as an author. I am the co-author of a pamphlet which argues that, with the wholesale adoption of new technology, 3 million new jobs could be created by the end of the century. This assumes that the balance of traditional industry, net losses and net gains is neutral. In that argument and detailed estimates I was assisted by Philip Virgo who has done some important work at the National Computer Centre. We estimate that the creation of the new jobs turns precisely on the reform of copyright as it affects software. I shall explain why.

The way in which jobs can be created in the entertainment world through legislation to prevent video piracy has already been shown. My hon. Friend's proposal will also have its beneficial impact on computer games.

I have a particular interest in educational material. On a recent visit to a school in my constituency I saw something which is new in my experience. I saw a class being taught by a teacher who had prepared software which simulated the production of a chemical. The software showed the way in which raw material costs and other costs are brought together. It enabled the 16-year-old pupils to work through the process by which a chemical is produced. It showed how its selling price was worked out and how resulting profit enabled new investment to be made.

To me that is a rare form of software. It was created by the enthusiasm of the teacher and because he had access to a company which helped him to put the software together. It points the way to an enourmous opportunity for more creative software with practical application in education. Such activity can create large numbers of jobs. However, such software is labour-intensive. In short, using new technology is likely to make teaching more effective and to create jobs.

We are approaching the time of shorter working lives, shorter working weeks and early retirement. The growth of adult education is therefore likely. Many of us see a role for ourselves in that area. Adult education is one of the inbuilt advantages of this place.

About 3,750,000 people are involved in further and adult education. It is estimated that if that figure were trebled—which is not unrealistic—and 12 million adults demanded 200 hours of material a year on 25,000 different topics, that would create employment for 400,000 programme preparers. Such figures are within our grasp if the fruits of this labour are not frittered away through piracy. Again, our estimates for information services show the potential for an additional 400,000 jobs during the next few years, once more based on adequate copyright reform. The United Kingdom information services industry is already employing over one million people. Prestel, which has barely begun to make its full impact, is the sort of area in which jobs will develop. It is a typical example of a product that is dependent on copyright reform. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby was modest in his remarks about job creation; I believe that there is substantial scope.

My hon. Friend also touched on the competitive position, and here there are some anxieties. Experts suggest that although we have been extremely good at producing software to make computers work, we are not as effective in producing software to help companies perform particular tasks—yet that is the area in which competition now runs most strongly. We must watch some of the opportunities being exploited by our competitors. The design of software for more effective use by manufacturing companies is an area that provides an obvious target for piracy. Industrial espionage is a highly developed form of piracy, and I can envisage piracy being directed down to a narrow point with the stealing of industrial secrets through software unless legislation is tightly drawn and applied internationally.

However, Britain has certain competitive advantages. Japanese development still has difficulties to overcome, not least the question of language. The United States, because of the pound-dollar relationship, is now expensive. The United Kingdom software industry is well placed to look for a further drive with this legislation behind it. We should look to the leading edge of technology and provide software that is more directly relevant to company needs rather than simply exploit the computer, which is no longer the area where innovation and inventive skills can best be deployed.

There is another aspect of international competition, which is the degree to which other countries, in making their parallel legislation, agree to further consultations and discussions — not only through the World Intellectual Property Organisation but on a Government-to-Government basis. I also agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Yeovil that the future of the COCOM export arrangement is relevant.

The Bill is admirably clear. It sets out to do something that we can all support. However, I am a little anxious about how it will be seen to be effective and whether we can be sure that it will not be overtaken by further technological development. Will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary consider whether it might be worth while extending the process that the Government have already taken on board — to look for the establishment of a number of small bodies, possibly created through industry itself—as FAST has been—but a body that is also seen to be outside the industry. It is difficult for an industry-organised body to adjudicate between competitive claims in industry. Oftel and the proposed Space Centre have recently been created. Possibly, following that example, the Government could see a way not only to meet my point about adjudication but to see the matter in relation to the industry's international activities — for example, its relationship with WIPO and with other countries. That might be a helpful way to ensure that we keep ahead in that area.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has always shown the greatest enthusiasm in these matters. He must recognise that from time to time Ministers and civil servants move posts. It is a weakness in our system that something which has been sustained through legislation and by understandings between countries can suffer a setback through a change of personnel or a change of the driving force in certain policies, and that we can no longer continue along the road that we had begun to walk with some certainty.

I would not normally suggest that a quango is still hidden in the corner of every heart, but in such a practical area there is an opportunity to consider with clarity and purpose the ways to make this Bill more effective.

I welcome the Bill and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby on the way that he introduced it. I wish it every success and I will help my hon. Friend in any way that I can during the Bill's further stages.

11.7 am

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am very glad to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) and endorse his sentiments. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) both on his good fortune in rising high in the ballot and on his supreme good sense in picking up this Bill and promoting it so efficiently and diligently to its present stage. I hope that before too long it will have a safe passage through this House and another place and on to the statute book. I thank FAST for its extremely efficient efforts to correlate the information and present it in an extremely attractive and effective form. I also thank the Ministers who have been involved—my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), my hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie), my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) at the Home Office—which played a significant part because of the enforcement aspects—and my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) who is with us today and who has such great knowledge of this area.

I do not want to repeat the speech that I made in July on my ten-minute rule Bill. I want to do what both my hon. Friend the Member for Corby and my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel did, which is to put the matter into the wider context of intellectual property reform, in which it has a real place. Some people are worried that this is another piece of piecemeal legislation and that we should not indulge in it. The House recognises that the need for protection against piracy is so urgent that the simple and beautifully clear Bill provided by the parliamentary draftsmen is eminently justified.

In the piracy of computer software, we are dealing not with the sophisticated plagiarist but with the outright crook. We are not dealing with someone who has his own sensible ideas and who may be overstepping the mark in drawing upon other people's ideas. We are dealing with people who have in the recent past invested money to pirate videotapes, and, having found that avenue to a quick buck closed off, have reinvested their ill-gotten gains in equipment that enables them to copy computer software.

The profits that can be made were amply set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby who pointed out that there can be, and has been, enormous innovation in the games market, which is at the bottom end, but that that innovation has been stolen in the most crude and callous way by the pirates so that, for the time being, innovation has largely dried up.

There is also a serious problem in business software, particularly for use on microcomputers. One can copy a floppy disc for, say, word processing software—such a disc would market at between £200 and £300—on a twin-disc drive microcomputer in perhaps 10 seconds.

That brings me to another unattractive feature of piracy that is not so much to do with the back-street manufacture and marketing through Blackbushe or the less reputable shops in the metropolis and elsewhere, but concerns the temptation offered to hardware manufacturers to encourage the sale of their hardware by supplying genuine software that is not good value but under-the-counter, swiftly pirated software, so enabling the user to get many hundred pounds more value out of his recently purchased hardware at someone else's expense—that someone else being the software house that has developed the software at substantial investment.

The industry has made great efforts to create a policing structure and I am confident that FAST and members of the industry will create a real policing structure once the Bill is on the statute book, a structure that will not put a significant extra burden on the public authorities and the police. Once we get the framework of law right, neither the policing nor the process of prosecution will be difficult. Once it is widely recognised by the pirates that they can swiftly be prosecuted, the object of the Bill—which is not to bring people to court but to dry up piracy—will be achieved.

On the wider scene, what should be our overall objective in the reform of our intellectual property system? That system covers patents, copyright, trade marks and other ancillary aspects. Hon. Members will agree that the object of our intellectual system should be to promote the technical and commercial interests of British industry in a fair and effective way.

The December 1983 Green Paper set out a framework for that, but it tried perhaps to construct an over-elaborate system that appeared to give so much protection to the owner of the intellectual property right that it could be abused to the disadvantage of certain aspects of the market. I say that not in a dogmatic way but to stimulate further consideration of the matter.

The intellectual property sub-group of the Society of Conservative Lawyers issued a paper, from which I have drawn heavily, which merits careful consideration by the Department of Trade and Industry, and I shall mention a few areas into which we should be progressing in parallel with the objectives of this measure.

People often think that intellectual property rights, patent rights and copyright are there to help the brilliant small innovator against the big man. All too often, however, patent rights and copyright can be exploited only by the large firm with substantial resources. The brilliant innovator who is seeking to do constructive work for himself and the nation can find himself enmeshed in a web of restriction and patent control, often involving trivial modifications of earlier patented or copyrighted aspects about which he cannot afford to litigate.

Lawyers who practise in this area—I am not one of them, although I have some experience of it—must time and again explain to their innovative clients that while they are almost certainly right in law, the maelstrom into which they would become involved if they embarked on litigation would bankrupt them; and they must advise them, as a matter of commercial common sense, to withdraw.

Mr. Michael Marshall: My hon. and learned Friend reminds me of a point that I intended to make but omitted to do so. I appreciate the line that he is pursuing and, like others, pay tribute to the spadework that he has done in this sphere. For the sake of simplicity and of trying to be comprehensive, will he accept that the use of the words "electronic publishing" would be better in some respects than talking about "computer software"? As we are looking for wider forms than those which relate purely to computers, he might care to join me in tabling an amendment in Committee which might be helpful in that respect.

Mr. Lyell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that interesting point. There is always difficulty in finding a more accurate phrase but we need one which bites firmly on the mind of the potential infringer. While I concede that his phrase may have certain advantages in accuracy, it might not come so swiftly to the mind of the pirate, and that is the mind we seek to impress. However, I shall give the matter further thought.

In considering how we proceed in parallel with the Bill in other aspects, we must remember that our present systems of intellectual property protection seem to give more protection to the foreigner than to the home-based innovator or producer. It is interesting to note that today the majority of patent holders in Britain are not United Kingdom-based. In 1983, the latest year for which I have statistics, 80 per cent. of all patents granted were granted to non-United Kingdom residents.

The structure of our intellectual property law is such that in wide areas the negative effects outweigh the positive. Our restrictions bite heavily on those who seek to innovate and manufacture in our home market but are much less restrictive on those who import.

We have the ludicrous situation that manufacturers in this country can be faced with competition from abroad which our existing legislation does not prevent, while, when those same manufacturers seek to export to other countries, as they lawfully can under the laws of those other countries, they may be prevented from doing so by our own intellectual property law in Britain. I hope that the Department will give urgent attention to that state of affairs because it needs correcting.

The Green Paper seems to go back on, if not a previous commitment by the Government, then at least a strong indication by Government that it would abolish industrial design copyright.

I do not think that it is widely recognised that our system of protection of industrial design copyright arose by accident. It was unforeseen and unintended by Parliament at the time of the passing of the Copyright Act 1956 and the Design Copyright Act 1968 and has come to be established only because skilful lawyers—who could perhaps be described less attractively as clever lawyers —were able to put together section 3(1)(a) of the 1956 Act which defines drawings as artistic works, "irrespective of artistic quality", and section 48(1) which says that a reproduction in a case of an artistic work "includes a version produced by converting the work into a three-dimensional form".

Thus, artistic copyright protection is given to the shape of mechanical parts. No one using the English language in its ordinary sense would have contemplated such a possibility.

Those who could produce parts for machines and functional items and could compete in this country are prevented, by a side wind, from doing so. All patent and copyright law legitimises monopoly, but monopolists are being given a far wider monopoly than was ever intended. These are sophisticated matters and I do not wish to weary the House with too much detail, but similar problems arise with parallel imports and on copyright law and piratical imports.

Case law can adversely affect practical considerations. I speak against myself as a lawyer and a practitioner in the courts, but in intellectual property law, the case of American Cyanamid v Ethicon has had an adverse effect. One of the great advantages of patent law used to be that when one went to court for an interlocutory injunction —one seldom went further because the object was to stop the infringer in his tracks—one was given a good indication of the strength of one's case because the law before American Cyanamid v Ethicon required that the court had to form a significant view, though not a final view, on the merits of the case.

The House of Lords subsequently said that that was not the correct law in the general field, which then applied to intellectual property law, and all that one now has to show is that one has a fairly arguable case, which is different from showing that, on at least an initial view, the merits are in one's favour.

We have changed that lesser requirement in industrial relations law, and everyone agrees that we were right to do so, and we should also abolish that approach in intellectual property law, so that those who go to court for swift and effective procedures get once more the swift and effective judgments that were so useful in the past.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby and ask that the Bill be seen not as an isolated piece of legislation, but as an important measure which will be essential to protect the industry from a serious problem and will, I hope, be part of moves by the Department of Trade and Industry towards further sensible reforms in intellectual property law.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Those of us who attempt to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) face two daunting tasks. The first is to match his eloquence, which is difficult, and the second is to match the detail of his exposition, and that can be done only by indulging in a degree of repetition.

I cannot claim marks for the originality of the preface to my comments because the point has already been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), but I do claim marks for sincerity when I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby on taking the initiative that led to the Bill and to this debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby was the first to say that some acknowledgement must also be given to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire whose ten-minute Bill established him as the parliamentary progenitor of this Bill.

It would also be appropriate at an early stage in my speech for me to join in singing the praises of the Federation Against Software Theft, which has been the prime mover in the campaign which has resulted in the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby paid tribute to the effective, reasoned and sensible way in which the federation handles its affairs. I echo that sentiment and note the sharp contrast with much of the sensationalism and bellyaching that we get from so many other lobby forces. I heard on the radio yesterday that dentists have been asked to write not only to their own hon. Member, but to all hon. Members.

May I inject an irreverent but heartfelt plea. For 13 years before becoming an hon. Member, I was a school teacher and one of the subjects that I taught was English. Perhaps I am more fussy than some other hon. Members, but I make the plea that on this side of the Atlantic we should spell the word programme with double "m" and an "e" at the end. That spelling appears in the body of the Bill, but not in the explanatory and financial memorandum. Let us have some consistency.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I support my hon. Friend's plea for consistency. One can take the view that the use of the word "programme" in relation to computers is different from any other use of the word and that therefore we should use the spelling "program". In that case, we should use that spelling throughout the Bill and not use one version of the word in one part of the Bill and duck the issue in another part. The spelling "program" is used throughout the world and I believe that it should be adopted in the Bill.

Mr. Hunter: All hon. Members can claim, to a greater or lesser extent, to represent the interests of high-tech industry. Computer business is a prominent part of that industry. High-tech industry tends to gravitate to certain parts of the country, one of which is the corridor between the M3 and the M4. Within that triangle, Basingstoke has increasing importance. I am advised that about 5,000 of my constituents are employed in the computer industry, and the number is rising rapidly as IBM and the Digital Equipment Corporation increase their presence in the town.

Thousands of my constituents therefore depend for their livelihoods on a flourishing computer industry, and the point of the Bill is precisely that: to ensure the prosperity of the computer industry. The Federation Against Software Theft does not mince its words. It says:

"Software theft is a serious and immediate problem threatening innovation, jobs and investment in the computer industry."

It is estimated that the industry is losing about £150 million a year through software theft. That is intolerable. That loss hits at the profitability of industry and, as we all know, that decreases the prospects of reinvestment, innovation and job creation.

A point which has been made frequently in the debate is that it is relatively easy to engage in software piracy. Such theft takes a variety of forms depending on the type of computer software which is involved. To the lay mind the distinction between various forms of software theft are perhaps not immediately discernible. I understand that there is replication without permission; there is counterfeiting; there is the production of look-alike copies substantially reproducing legitimate programmes; and there is the unauthorised supply and use of computer software. I have no doubt that there are many other forms of software theft.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby warned that I would concentrate on one firm if I were lucky enough to catch the eye of Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Digital Equipment Corporation has a major presence in my constituency. It is known in the trade as DEC, and from now on I shall refer to it thus. It is worth while considering the way in which that company has analysed the problem of theft and set about seeking solutions.

About two years ago DEC undertook an analysis to try to establish the loss which it was suffering from software theft. It calculated the number of computers which it was selling in the United Kingdom, presumably not an especially difficult task. It then made certain assumptions about the average number of operating systems, allied projects and application programmes that it expected to licence per computer. The calculations of the expected licence revenue were compared with actual revenue and the company made the staggering calculation that it was losing about £10 million per year: clearly a figure of great consequence and seriousness to it, notwithstanding that it has the third largest turnover in the industry in Britain.

I have already stressed the consequences for companies whose profit margins are being hit by theft. Reduced profit margins ultimately affect job creation. DEC's reaction was typical of companies in this position. First, it joined the organisation that is called the Federation against Software Theft. It was one of the founding members of FAST. Mr. Roger Tuckett of the law department of DEC in the United Kingdom became, and remains, a member of the FAST management team. DEC senior management in the United Kingdom and in Europe gives the federation full and total support. The international factor has already been introduced into the debate. DEC sees the initiative which has been taken in Britain as one that should be followed up in other European countries.

DEC's second reaction was to work through the trading association to counter the problem of software theft. DEC is represented on the intellectual property committee of Beta, which is considering the interests of companies similar to DEC.

The company's third reaction was to take legal action. In 1983 there was an out-of-court settlement following a dispute about the unauthorised copying of DEC software and the failure to pay licence fees. Nearly $5·5 million were paid to the company in settlement. Other proceedings continue. There are proceedings against another company alleging unauthorised copying and distribution of DEC software. There have been 11 court hearings to date and, apart from one minor issue, DEC has won at each hearing.

The company's attitude is typical of that which is being adopted by other comparable companies. It feels that it must protect its investment in its technology and it will not hesitate to enforce its rights in the courts if necessary.

The growing significance of software manufacture to the computer industry is not always realised. It is the largest growth area within the industry. I received a letter from DEC this morning, one paragraph of which reads:

"on the relative importance of DEC's software business, this now corresponds to about 15 per cent. of total turnover. While DEC's business overall is growing at about 30 per cent. per year in the United Kingdom, the software related part of this is growing at about 65 per cent. per year."

Those are most impressive figures.

It is clear that theft affects all parts of the software business. FAST has distinguished three major categories. First, it speaks of theft of high-cost/low-volume software. That is software that is used on large or medium-sized computers which retail at a price of £1,000 upwards. This software includes operating systems and application packages. In this area we are up against unauthorised copying and using by users, illicit copying by distributors and the production of look-alikes.

The second area which FAST identifies is the theft of medium-cost/medium-volume software. This is software that is used on microcomputers within a price range of £50 to £1,000. It includes smaller business computers and personal computers. The illegal practices include illicit copying and use and supply by users and distributers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby referred briefly to a study which was undertaken by Aston university in 1983. Among other things, those who undertook the study came to the conclusion that 25 per cent. of microcomputer software companies suffered serious losses of revenue through software theft. The more successful programmes are the most susceptible to theft. The number of illegal copies exceed legitimate copies by more than three to one.

Thirdly, FAST has drawn attention to the category of low-cost/high-volume home computer software theft. This includes computer games and education software. We are talking of software that is distributed mainly through high street outlets. There is widespread counterfeiting. Illegal copies outnumber legitimate copies by up to 12 to one.

FAST has analysed current prosecution activities. It is clear that software copyright owners are already pursuing policing and enforcement activities, including investigations, the targeting of criminals, the search and seizure of illegal material, prosecutions, and, above all, publicity and education. These are some of the activities in which companies are already involving themselves to the full.

Major companies are conducting a growing numbr of investigations into software theft, especially in the high-cost/low-volume software league. Legal action is being taken and I have learnt of the establishment by the Guild of Software Houses of a fighting fund to help finance legal actions.

In all cases FAST stresses that prosecutions are limited to civil actions because of the unrealistic criminal penalties currently available for copyright infringement of computer software. The most significant point is that the smaller companies with slender resources, especially in the microcomputer software sector, are reluctant to take legal action because of the element of doubt that still remains about copyright protection applying to computer software. There is a residual doubt about that part of the law, and that doubt must be removed.

A paper produced earlier in the year by Mr. Roger Tuckett contains clear thoughts on this matter. The paper was entitled "Controlling Infringement of Copyright in Computer Software" and stated:

"Under Section 21 Copyright Act 1956, it is a criminal offence to manufacture or distribute articles which are known to be infringing copies of a copyright work. There is no reason why prosecutions should not be brought under the present legislation in appropriate cases for software piracy. However the police and other authorities are reluctant to investigate and institute prosecutions for two reasons. First, they believe there is still legal doubt that computer software is protected under copyright law. Secondly, they believe the present criminal penalties are derisory."

"In the past, criminal prosecutions for software piracy have been rare. Today there are a handful of such criminal investigations taking place, some of which may result in appropriate prosecutions and convictions.

Prosecutions are normally brought by Police Authorities or Trading Standards Officers. These bodies are showing increasing willingness to become involved in helping to deal with this increasing area of dishonesty. They will continue to look to the computer industry for technical advice and support when bringing prosecutions. If a company which is suffering from software piracy is able to persuade these authorities to take action, it will obviously avoid the considerable expenses involved in bringing civil proceedings. It is hoped that the clear effective remedies to be provided by the new Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Bill will encourage these public enforcement agencies to use their resources to deal with the current and future problems."

I believe that we all share that hope.

The need for legislative changes is indisputable. There is an urgent need for clarification and strengthening of the law. This serious problem will be reduced and the effectiveness of all the remedies—civil and criminal—will be increased by these amendments to the Copyright Act 1956. That is why we need the amendments. They are straightforward and are not contentious. It is clear that they will appeal to, and be accepted by, all parties represented in the House.

The Bill will enable the industry to continue its fight against software theft within a framework of legal certainty and more effective copyright protection. As FAST concludes, for all categories of software theft, the explicit reference to computer programmes in the Copyright Act will be the cornerstone for educating everybody that software theft is not "fair game" but illegal and to the detriment of the community. I welcome the Bill, and I wish it well.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I warmly welcome the initiative taken by my hon. Friend the member for Corby (Mr. Powell) in introducing the Bill and the earlier initiatives of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell). The information technology and software industry owes them a great deal for the large amount of time they have spent in pushing the Bill through.

I believe that the Bill should not be necessary. It is necessary because of a fundamental fallacy. The same fallacy gave rise to the Data Protection Act 1984 which is costing British industry several hundreds of millions of pounds. The fallacy is that data are somehow fundamentally different if stored magnetically on a floppy disc, a hard disc, a tape or by some other method of digital storage rather than stored on paper in black and white. It is ludicrous that companies can store millions of names and addresses in card index systems without falling within the jurisdiction of the Data Protection Act, but if the information is stored on a home computer or microcomputer, the companies fall within the bounds of the Act.

In the past, lawyers, in their wisdom, have decided that, because data are stored magnetically or electronically, they do not fall within the bounds of the Copyright Act 1956. The Bill is an important part of a jigsaw. If over the next few years we can find the other pieces of the jigsaw, we may reveal a picture of a healthy information technology industry. The Bill is only one piece of the jigsaw. Unfortunately, too often we in Britain put ourselves down. Company failures in the information technolgy industry cause us great concern and receive great publicity, but, for every company that fails in a blaze of publicity, there are many more healthy companies. Failures are a facet of a young and growing industry.

The NEDO report, which was published in the summer of last year, cast gloom over the information technology industry. Astonishingly, the report did not deal with microchips. British companies are rapidly becoming European leaders in microchip production, especially in certain types of chips such as Customs chips and fast Dynamic RAMs. Because the report did not mention microchips, it missed a vital component of the information technology market.

We can be proud of our achievements in information technology. Some of the best business computers are made in Britain. It is interesting to note how one relatively small Birmingham company—ACT—managed to change itself from being largely an importer of American computers into a major force in the manufacture of home computers. Although British industry is under severe pressure from foreign competition, some companies, such as PSION, are producing products that are world beaters.

Government policy has been forward looking and instrumental in encouraging the information technology sector in England. Pump-priming policies and specialist schemes have been the correct way forward. It would be wrong to go for vast, ludicrous bureaucratic and expensive projects, such as those mounted by the last Labour Government. For example, the Labour Government wasted £36 million of taxpayers' money on one project —a company called NEXOS which, apparently, Labour politicians dreamt would one day rival IBM. Two years ago, predictably, that company went under because of mismanagment and the problems of setting it up. The taxpayer is £36 million poorer.

Despite the successes of the policies of the Department of Trade and Industry in encouraging the information technology sector, we need more direction. I am not talking about French-style dirigisme which has helped to plunge the French information technology sector into massive losses. I am talking about the realisation of where our national interests lie, and that means that a more aggressive attitude must be taken to trade barriers which inhibit the growth and prosperity of the information technology industry in England.

The European, Japanese, and far east telecommunications markets are far from free. Any British company wanting to export software or information technology products to American markets come up against the Buy American Act. That means that if public corporations wish to buy foreign products they must cost at least 10 per cent. less than comparative American products. I should be astonished if that could be called free trade. Yet this country freely allows in telecommunications products from Italy, Germany, Japan and Taiwan. Our schools are full of American products.

I understand that one of the major reasons for the problems of Acorn was its failure to break into the American market. One of the reasons for that failure was that it could not get into the American education system because the United States Government insisted that it brought American-made products. The company also came up against the Buy American Act. I strongly believe that free trade is the best way to further the prosperity of all nations, but it is clear that we do not have free trade in the world. When other countries refuse to take our products on a reciprocal basis, we must be far more aggressive in putting barriers in the way of their products until they open their markets to our information technology and other products.

We seem to be acting against the interests of our information technology industry over origin marking. The origin marking regulations are now hopelessly out of date. Most business equipment, including computers and software, do not have to have on them the country of final assembly or the countries where most of the components are made. We can buy a computer or software over the counter or by mail order without knowing where it was made. Most people want to buy British goods, be they computers or software, but more often than not they do not have the opportunity to know where the equipment was made.

I shall quote the example of a British company called Amstrad. It imports its own-brand computers from Taiwan. It is a successful home computer which is sold with a range of computer software and most people buying that product believe that it is British. Even the Financial Times, which should know better, called it a British product.

How can British consumers buy British-made computers? The structure of the industry is such that many computers contain foreign components. How can we urge our consumers to buy British when we do not, by law, insist on manufacturers, importers and distributors putting the countries of origin on computers, telecommunications equipment and software?

Another way in which we seem to be acting against the interests of our information technology sector is that we charge more duty on the import of components that go into British computers than we do on the import of fully built computers. It is a disincentive for British manufactured computers to compete if their components carry more duty than the finished, imported product which probably contains the same components.

This country has a great opportunity to win a large share of the world software markets if we can get matters right. There are many ways to get it right other than by the Bill. The structure of the information technology market is moving in such a way that it is especially easy for small companies to produce and market software to run on a range of machines, because increasingly over the past five years world computer manufacturers have a few standard processes and operating systems which they buy and assemble into their products.

The result is that computers, be they made in Taiwan, Tokyo, Frankfurt or Farnham, almost invariably run the same software. That means that a company no longer, as it did 10 years ago, has to be massive, with massive resources, to write software. Relatively small outfits can now succeed. A problem that many of those companies experience, apart from piracy, is the cost of marketing. It does not cost a vast amount to produce an excellent software package, but it costs perhaps 20 or 30 times as much to market it successfully. The Department of Trade and Industry might consider helping some of our fledgling software companies to market in the United Kingdom and overseas.

The Bill will help British information technology enormously. It is an important part in the jigsaw. If we could find the other pieces, it would lead to a vibrant prosperous industry in this country over the next 20 years. The British industry is a delicate shoot. More direction is needed, but not direction in the French sense of the all-seeing, all-powerful bureaucracy trying to control and mould every aspect of the industry. It needs a little more recognition of where our national interest lies, and a few prods in the right direction from the Department of Trade and Industry would be welcome. I recognise that it has already done a great deal to help the industry.

The Bill is a small but vital step in the right direction. I warmly welcome it, and I warmly thank my hon. Friend the Member for Corby for taking such pains and making such efforts to ensure that it came before the House.

11.56 am

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I should like to join all those who have offered their congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on introducing the Bill. When one comes high in the ballot it is always difficult to decide which of all the subjects of merit one should pursue.

A change in copyright legislation is vital for the software industry. I should declare my past interest in the subject as, for many years before being elected to this this place, I worked for ICL in the development of computer software and advising people on the use of such software.

The nature of computer software, as has already been said, has changed significantly. In the early days of computer use there were relatively few different computers, costing substantial sums of money. A few bespoke software packages were made and there was much greater tailoring activity. Over the years the cost of computer hardware has fallen dramatically. It is an essential requirement that package software is produced that can be matched easily with many machines. That has the advantage of spreading development costs over large numbers of copies.

As has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby and others, there is an enormous potential for growth in the production of software. A figure of 22 per cent. has been mentioned. Whether that is accurate will depend in part on the Bill's passage. There is no doubt that the development of good quality software depends upon good profits being made from it.

It is relatively easy to produce software cheaply and quickly, but if we are to produce the software that will provide effective systems for users, or good games for children and others, substantial efforts will have to be made. If there is piracy, the value of those efforts is destroyed.

Therefore, although in the short term it may appear that the passage of the Bill would aid the computer software industry, in the slightly longer term the real beneficiary would be the user. Whether the user be the child playing the fun computer games or the large company operating a major stock control system, if there is not the incentive, through good returns and good profits, to develop expensively the software that is necessary, inferior products will be the type available to all. That is the growing danger.

In the computer world there have been planted a considerable number of seeds of computer software, and we are seeing them grow. The danger is that there is also a parasite that is growing quickly. It may stunt the growth of individual items of software and damage the quality of those that are produced. I believe that the Bill will help to end that blight.

There are substantial differences in the nature of software and software sales for differenct types of machines. With home games it is ludicrously easy to copy cassettes containing such games; indeed, even where the manufacturer endeavours to protect his software when it is loaded on to the computer, it is possible to copy the software by using an audio cassette system. By that means an identical version is produced through an electronic or audio machine, thereby overcoming the efforts that the manufacturer has made to protect his investment and his users' interests.

With regard to business microcomputers, as has been said, most of the software is distributed on floppy discs, and that software can be copied from disc to disc in a matter of moments. I have seen attempts made to protect such software and there are suitable means that can be used, but sometimes those very means can be a confounded nuisance to the genuine users of software. I know of instances where a manufacturer of software has put in date locks so that, unless the user of the software returns to the manufacturer after a year or some such time and gets a special modification, the software ceases to work. It is a good way of preventing the illicit use of such software, but the confusion that can be caused to the legitimate user, if there is some failure in communication, can be enormous. Therefore, whenever a manufacturer endeavours to provide protection, he may well be making life more difficult for the valid user.

With the most expensive forms of software, distributed on large mainframes and so on, there are different realms of complication. Today most packages are built in modular form, and the manufacturer will endeavour to use some of those modules in his packages. It was said earlier that there is not too much sophisticated copying taking place. That is not so, because there is an advantage to be gained by a software thief in taking some of those modules and incorporating them into another package that the rival manufacturer may be producing, thus saving money and enabling the rival to develop a series of packages at a cheaper rate simply because he has been saved the cost of some of the essential modules. I hope and believe that the Bill will enable that sort of abuse to be dealt with. It is an essential requirement of any legislation.

There have been comments about the use of the terms "computer programme" and "computer software". I hope that the promoter of the Bill will resist any attempts to change the term "computer software". Among its other merits, the Bill has the merit of clarity. The intention of the Bill is clear in meeting a particular problem. The Copyright Act 1956 is the appropriate measure to be amended, and in extending that Act to enable it to cope with a new and developing problem we are taking the most effective legislative action that we can. I congratulate the promoter of the Bill and hope that it will have a speedy passage through the House.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The Bill is a useful and necessary measure, and, on behalf of the official Opposition, I hope that it will complete its passage through the House at the earliest opportunity.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on drafting and producing the Bill and on his comprehensive exposition of the industry's problems and the way that the Bill will address them. The Bill does not, of course, deal with all the problems of copyright in what is a very complex and rapidly changing technological field. Still less does it tackle all the problems of the software industry, but the hon. Gentleman did not claim that it did.

There is the converse problem of securing standardisation of software. In terms of the propagation of the use of computers and applications for computers that is extremely important, but there is no sense in which the Bill conflicts with that area. Indeed, a proper protection of copyright is a necessary part of the securing of standardisation. The necessarily complex operating systems that can be used to secure standardisation and portability themselves need to be properly protected by copyright.

The Bill cannot solve all the problems of electronic publishing—a matter that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall). It cannot cover questions of copyright of data bases or data banks which, presumably, can range from the design of a jet engine to the design of a microcircuit, the on-line access to all the United Kingdom company accounts in Companies House, the complete set of laws of all industrial countries, or whatever may be the data bases that are available now or may come to be available in the future. That is the whole area of copyright and electronic publishing, and the idea of sweeping up all that in a private Member's Bill is not only impracticable but outside the long title of the Bill. Therefore, it could not be dealt with during the passage of the Bill.

The best service that the Opposition can do for the Bill and, indeed, for employment in that vital industry and its future development, is to facilitate the Bill's progress both on Second Reading and in the remaining stages. Speaking personally, I should have no objection to the Bill completing its remaining stages today and would not seek to block that, if it was the wish of the hon. Member for Corby.

We have had no representations against the Bill, nor any representations seeking amendments to it. If we receive any representations or objections to it, we shall certainly see that they are pressed in another place. I believe that the Under-Secretary has had no objections to the Bill, either. If, when the industry reads the debate and realises the progress that has been made, it were to raise any questions or propose any amendments from outside the House, I hope that the Under-Secretary would consider them carefully before the Bill went to another place.

Out of consideration for the progress of other private Member's Bills—we understand the natural pressure of time—and as the Bill is supported on both sides of the House and no objections have been raised, my best service is simply to commend it to the House and sit down in the hope that it will secure a speedy passage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I thank all hon. Members on both sides of the House for the contributions that have been made in an excellent and informed debate. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will join me in noting the unanimity in the House. I think that it is no exaggeration to say that in the House the Bill has no enemies. Suffice it to say that outside the House we cannot detect a lobby that has attempted to counter the arguments put forward by the Federation Against Software Theft and, in fairness, by several companies and individual associations that wish to protest and do something about software theft, which is what we are discussing today.

I do not think that "theft" is too strong a word. We are talking of the theft of intellectual property, the loss of revenue to those who rightfully can expect to accrue benefit from their intellectual effort. Therefore, I join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), who set the scene for today's events.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby reminded us of the $61 billion turnover of the industry. He talked about the $12 billion turnover in western Europe, which illustrated vividly the burgeoning growth of and significant contribution made by information technology, particularly the software industry. I shall refer later to some other figures that illustrate the point that my hon. Friend made, but in a particularly British context. Those figures come from the Computing Services Association and prove yet again that the industry is growing at geometric rates and seems to be immune from the problems which, tragically, affect other industries in terms of recession and recovery. Worldwide, we are looking at a growth of about 20 per cent. per annum, consistently, remorselessly, and with great effect.

My hon. Friend reminded us of a significant report published by the Information Technology Advisory Panel. I remember that report with considerable affection. There were times when I felt that there should have been a slightly more vigorous response to its recommendations. It stated that information and the information industry are of great significance, and that of itself information is a product. It can be assembled, bought and sold; one can add value to it, and one can import and export it. It is one of my objectives, and indeed one of the objectives of my Department to ensure that all the measures and policies required to make London the international exchange for information in this respect, as it is currently the international exchange for financial services, should be invoked and encouraged by hon. Members. It is the new entrepot trade of the final years of the 20th century and the early years of the 21st century. We in the United Kingdom are particularly equipped with the talents to make a major contribution and, indeed, to earn major revenues on the international market in information trade.

Therefore, as my hon. Friend and others have reminded us, the Bill is a legitimate measure to underpin, with an appropriate protective mechanism, the continued growth of the information trade, and the interests of the United Kingdom information and software providers in particular. Not only do we want London to become the world's information exchange; we should also like to see the rapidly growing business in value-added network services continue to grow at that rate. The business is still in its infancy, but I believe that it will be a major provider of wealth and, indeed, jobs. However, again those people need the protection that is contained in this measure.

I welcome the support and contribution of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I know that he is pressed for time today, so I appreciate his courtesy in returning to the Chamber and participating in the latter stages of our debate. I have already endorsed his observation that copying is theft. It is the stealing of intellectual property.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire reminded us of the path that he trod in earlier months and the intellectual wrestling that he had to undertake to establish that the House would welcome a measure under the ten-minute Bill procedure to protect our software authors and houses. I join hon. Members on both sides of the House in commending that trail-blazing work of my hon. and learned Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) raised several points that I should like to deal with later in the debate. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Corby, he rightly said that there has to be an international dimension to the debate. Of course, we wish to consider how we monitor and assess the progress of our industry and the pressures that may damage it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel said, we are aware that the industry still could do several things to help itself. However, as a result of the activities of FAST, the Federation Against Copyright Theft and other organisations that have fought this battle, we see the trade associations in the industrial sectors coming together to counteract the increasing, but—I hope soon—decreasing threat of theft.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) forcefully fought on behalf of the interests of the industry and his constituents. That is the happiest combination of circumstances to which an hon. Member can hope to be beholden. I take his point that in one company alone that is strongly represented in his constituency there is concern about the £10 million loss per annum through software theft. That supports the view that there is a significant problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) made one of his coded speeches which was based on remarks, which are as perceptive today as they have been on previous occasions, concerning the international trade barriers against telecommunications products. I assure my hon. Friend that the Department of Trade and Industry is aware of the problem. No doubt my hon. Friend will continue to pursue his campaign through questions, and I hope that I shall be able to allay his anxieties. We are anxious to see a free and fair market in telecommunications products. That is not the subject of today's debate but may I, en passant, mention that I have endorsed my hon. Friend's line, not least in Dusseldorf when I pointed out in a recent speech that it was easier to sell telecommunications products in Detroit than in Dusseldorf. We need to see a true common market in those products as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend made an excellent point about the need for help with marketing. The Department of Trade and Industry has a legitimate role here. As I have said before, I should be delighted if the information technology industry, particularly the smaller companies and the software houses, were to take greater advantage of the market entry guarantee scheme which can provide up to £350,000 worth of help in meeting the costs of gaining access to a market which are crucial for a new small growing company that has to go through the pain barrier of gaining access to such markets. I have put that on the record again. I cannot make the invitation more vividly than I have today. No doubt my hon. Friends will draw that to the attention of companies in their constituencies whose interests we seek to support.

The hon. Member for Yeovil said that he hoped that the House would have an opportunity shortly to discuss the licensing of software items for export. That is a matter for the Leader of the House, and I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade told the House on 8 February. In the meantime, I commend to the hon. Gentleman, who is, shall we say, worldly in matters of security and strategic considerations, an excellent book about the KGB which contains a magnificent chapter on the huge resources that the KGB deploys internationally through front and other organisations to obtain software and hardware which Russia can make use of in its armaments and industrial programmes. It makes for stimulating, if not terrifying, reading.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister referring to that seminal work "Techno-Bandits"?

Mr. Butcher: No; I am referring to another book which I bought at York station only two days ago. I am desperately trying to remember the name of the author. I think that it is a chap called Baron. It certainly gives an interesting insight into the efforts made by the KGB to obtain information in this area.

Mr. Ashdown: I must obviously buy that book as I pass through Waterloo in 20 minutes. "Techno-Bandits" is another excellent book which deals with the same subject. One of the points that is most powerfully made in it is that it is the nature of the attempt to apply licensing provision universally which makes the system so leaky that the KGB can get in and lift out all the secrets that it wants. A more appropriate licensing system which would be easier to police would be tighter in its definitions that that which is now proposed.

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. As I said earlier, that is not the subject of today's debate, but I should like to take this opportunity to join the hon. Gentleman in that objective. It may be that in the detail of our wish to achieve it we differ tactically, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be embarrassed on a future occasion if I were to remind him of his words today.

We share a mutual anxiety that behind the whole COCOM debate and the rather hysterical observations that have been made there is a serious problem. But we must look after United Kingdom interests, both industrial and commercial. I hope that that will not be done in an atmosphere of naivety on the part of some our domestic companies. Perhaps today we can exhort them to read that same section, if not the whole book, in "Techno-Bandits". No doubt we shall return to this matter on another occasion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel asked for a comment on a possible international convention on software protection. He may know that a joint study is proceeding in the World Intellectual Property Organisation and UNESCO on the legal protection of computer software. I believe that as part of that study there is to be a meeting next week in Geneva. Although the possibility of a new international convention has been considered in that study, I understand that that is not the direction in which it is currently moving. There is a wide international consensus that copyright is the right vehicle for protecting software, and there is a widely held view, which I share, that the existing international conventions on copyright — the Berne convention and the universal copyright convention — are the appropriate international vehicles for protection.

There is a need for further study internationally and that is proceeding. No doubt my hon. Friend's observations will be noted in the appropriate quarters. Through my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and others we shall consider whether our input into that process should be a little more pointed.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire suggested that the Bill might be amended to deal with the broader questions of electronic publishing. Reference has already been made to the comprehensive review of copyright currently being undertaken by the Government. An important consideration that arises in that context is the need to introduce a modern law of copyright that is capable of dealing with the present and future state of technology. The impact of electronic publishing is clearly an important element in that. I can assure my hon. and learned Friend that when the Government introduce their plans for a coprehensive copyright reform great care will be taken to ensure that they are appropriate to deal with advances in technology.

Mr. Michael Marshall: My hon. Friend is answering questions that I put to him, but my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) made the same points. I am obliged to my hon. Friend for what he has just said. In the light of that assurance, I make it plain that I certainly would not wish to delay the passage of the Bill. Any suggestion that I may have made about an

[Mr. Powell]

My final example concerns another multinational software house supplying business software on microcomputers. It estimates that between 10 and 20 per cent. of its users are unauthorised. That is resulting in a loss of revenue of between 10 and 20 per cent. The company is having to invest more than £1 million per annum in alternative technological methods of protection. All of them are necessarily — at a price — vulnerable to penetration and to copying. Money is having to be spent to protect the software but no final protection is possible. All that is necessary is for the pirate to invest more to break the protection.

A pirate is able to sell the pirated product for as little as one tenth of what the market price would be to the author of the software product, so that it becomes impossible for legitimate businesses to make any worthwhile return on their efforts. That has dampened all prospect for successful development of the market.

One of the world's largest computer software houses, Digital Equipment Corporation — my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) hopes to say something about it in due course—has estimated that in 1983 in the United Kingdom it lost £10 million in revenue from unauthorised copying of its software through piracy. The best estimate for 1984 is that lost sales and royalties amounted to no less than £150 million. As the total size of the market for 1984 is just over £1 billion, the £150 million is consistent with my examples of between 10 and 20 per cent. loss of revenue.

All the companies which have approached me about the problem, and also approached the organisation — the Federation Against Software Theft—which has been set up by the industry itself to tackle some of the fundamental problems of the law and organisation, have stressed the fundamental importance of copyright law in the protection of computer programmes, and the need to remove remaining uncertainty about their copyright position. There is not the slightest doubt that, even though there are many actions that the industry itself can take, none will be successful unless the law of copyright is extended so that it without doubt covers computer software.

That is the one safeguard which, more than anything else, Parliament can give to the industry. That is why I put such importance in my analysis on the taking of that one step. If we give the software houses that opportunity, it will be in their hands to take all the other necessary steps to guarantee their survival, growth prosperity, and contribution to the national economy in the future. Then, if they fail, it will not be because we have let them down but because they have been unable to rise to the challenge of the enormous growth to which I referred at the beginning of my speech.

The consequences flowing from the situation that I have described are lost investment and lost opportunities. At the bottom end of the market, a computer game of any merit may cost between £50,000 and £100,000 of investment to bring to the market and to sell. A computer game can be copied in 40 seconds on to a floppy disc. To get that pirated floppy disc to produce a sufficient quantity of the computer game and get it on to the market can take three to four weeks, so the manufacturer of a software game may have as short a time as three weeks in which to make a return on his investment.

In those circumstances, it is not surprising that very few new worthwhile games are being commissioned at present. There is no hope that any company can get a worthwhile return against such a background. I know that the House will be fully aware that only good software is copied. Nobody bothers to pirate a thoroughly inferior and worthless product that nobody would buy. It is the quality material that is most vulnerable, and inevitably it involves more investment.

Let us suppose that any hon. Member or any member of the public listening to the debate decided that he could develop a software programme, and he went to his bank manager and said that he would have four weeks, and no more, to get a return on the investment. Is there the slightest prospect that the bank manager would be prepared to lend the money necessary for that investment? Of course not. Therefore, investment for the development of computer software programmes is drying up. That is part of the overall tragedy, with declining numbers of firms, declining outside commission with declining jobs in the industry. That is why the industry itself feels uncertain about its propects. As it stands, the law is pathetically inadequate to cope with the situation.

Lawyers will argue among themselves whether copyright covers software. Some will say that it does, and some will say that it does not. Some will say that it might, although something else might be the case, and each case has to be dealt with on its individual merits. Prosecutions in the criminal courts are extremely rare. It has been necessary to resort to the most undesirable developments and extensions of the law to try to catch the pirates.

In July last year, in the county of Devon, a youngster from west Yorkshire was accused of hiring out a copy of a software tape and photocopies of the manual that went with it. He was summoned before the Teignmouth magistrates' court in Devon under the Trade Descriptions Act. It had been necessary to resort to that Act to try to bring any sort of case at all against the youngster, effectively to accuse him of selling something that was not what it described itself to be because it was pirated. He was fined £40 with £50 costs.

In no way can the Trade Descriptions Act be an effective vehicle in the criminal courts for stopping piracy. Therefore, the industry has had to resort more and more to expensive, time-consuming and often rather uncertain civil actions. The House will be aware that when a company feels that its commercial position is being undermined by piracy it is possible to apply to the court for an Anton Piller order, which will effectively stop it, pending the outcome of proceedings in the civil courts. It is fundamental to the procedure of obtaining an Anton Piller order that one moves immediately it becomes plain that one is in trouble. However, because of the difficulty for the person to prove, so accurate are the copies that are made in pirated programmes, that it is his own programme and he had the copyright to it, there is delay. Thus there are substantial risks that the court will not come to someone's assistance because he has delayed much longer than was necessary.

However, equally, no lawyer could advise his client to proceed by the civil law unless he had 100 per cent. proof of his claim. The risk of failure is too great and the prospect of being undermined if there is a failure is so overwhelming that lawyers have had to be extremely cautious. Substantial sums of money are now being spent essentially on lawyers. I declare an interest. I am a lawyer.

The Bill that I am promoting is definitely against my interest as a lawyer—and so it should be. It is a scandal that money that should be used to develop the industry is being used to cushion some of the uncomfortable facts of life for lawyers in the Temple and elsewhere.

Therefore, the prospects of successfully protecting software programmes under existing law are uncertain at best and hostile at worst. As the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) stressed, many of the smaller firms simply do not have the resources to do anything. They concede defeat even before they start because they do not have the resources. I am certain that the House will be anxious to end that situation as soon as possible.

However, the industry is taking several important steps to protect itself, through technical protection. It is possible to build into a programme means of technical protection. It is expensive to do so and increases the cost of the product, but it raises the stakes in the battle between software houses and pirates. Certain pirates might be deterred from piracy because of the additional cost involved in breaking that protection. As I have said, the simple fact is that the large houses can raise the stakes, but that still does not represent a satisfactory administration of our law.

Because of all those difficulties, in the summer of last year the industry came together to form its own body, the Federation Against Software Theft, with the avowed purpose of focusing on the inadequacy of the law, particularly the copyright law, and to bring to the public's attention what was happening and to try to sway public opinion so that people began to realise that piracy was theft and was doing considerable damage to industry, employment, investment and jobs for the future.

I should like to use this opportunity to pay tribute to the way in which FAST has carried out its activities in the past year. We in the House are all used to lobbyists. We are all used to mail and literature raining upon us, which is unwelcome. We need large wastepaper baskets to accommodate all that descends upon us. If ever there was an example of a successful, persuasive body carrying out its duties and objectives in the most professional and successful way, FAST is it. I pay particular tribute to the chairman of FAST, Mr. Donald Maclean, who has done so much to bring us to the point of discussing this subject almost at the first reasonable opportunity that the House could have had.

Very early on Mr. Maclean was able to persuade my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) to introduce a Bill under the ten minutes rule on 25 July last year, which for the first time in the House focused on the industry's problem. That Bill was not consigned, like so many such Bills, to the wastepaper basket after a short airing of the grievance that it raised but became the springboard of a sustained campaign, within the House and without, for a change of the law. I am delighted to say that, before my hon. and learned Friend introduced his Bill, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), then the Minister for Information Technology, had written to Mr. Maclean of FAST, saying:

"I warmly welcome the setting up of the Federation Against Software Theft. The software industry is a very important, and quickly growing sector of the British economy. It is already a major contributor to national wealth and employment in this country, and it is essential that it should be in a position to protect itself unlawful copying. I am very pleased to see that the industry is organising itself to counter in a concerted way the threat of software theft, and I would like to assure the new Federation Against Software Theft of my support and encouragement for their valuable efforts in this area."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley was as good as his word and so has been his successor. My hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology and the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have been of invaluable and fundamental assistance to our efforts to secure a change in the law. Without their help none of this would have been possible. Equally, it would not have been possible if both sides of the House were not convinced that a change in the law is necessary.

I am delighted to be able to pay the most fulsome tribute possible to the hon. Members for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and for Yeovil who are here today, and for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), all of whom represent parties different from my own. Without their assistance and advice, none of this would have been possible. All are entitled to their share of the thanks which I know the industry would wish to extend for the assistance which it has received.

It is interesting that what is occurring in Britain has been occurring in other countries. We are not alone. We are not acting in isolation in seeking a reform of the copyright law. We are parallel with some countries, and slightly behind or slightly ahead of others. The United States, through federal legislation in 1980, extended the copyright law to cover computer software. Various state legislatures in the United States are considering specific anti-piracy laws for their jurisdictions. Louisiana was the first state to pass a distinctive anti-piracy measure for computer software.

In 1984 the Australian Parliament passed what is virtually emergency legislation because a judgment given at first instance appeared to suggest that copyright did not subsist in computer software and it was necessary to reverse that. The Canadian Parliament is considering a change in the law almost identical to the one which we are now considering.

The House will be alert to the fact that the examples that I have given so far have been common law jurisdictions. In Europe the Roman-Dutch law jurisdictions of the Common Market do not think of copyright in the same way as we do. They do not have such a sophisticated view of copyright. To them, copyright must be seen as part of a wider legal pattern involving concepts of unfair trading, which we do not have as finely developed as they do. Their legal analysis is frequently different from our own, which creates some of the difficulties to which I alluded earlier in my call for a common response throughout the Community to these problems. It is no good wishing that they were not there because they are.

Throughout the Community, it has been necessary for courts of first and sometimes appellate status to extend copyright by case law to cover computer software. In country after country, bodies such as FAST have been formed in order to try to protect the industry and to seek a change in the law. Only last week such a body was set up in Italy. There is already such a body in Holland, and moves are afoot in France, Germany and throughout the Community parallel to those here. Not only in North America, the Commonwealth and the Common Market, but in countries of the orient, courts of first jurisdiction are beginning to extend the law of copyright so that it covers their particular problem.

past three hours many generous tributes have been paid to me. I thank the House for its courtesy in listening to my very long opening speech and I thank hon. Members for the generosity of their remarks about me—which were largely undeserved. It was my good fortune to emerge towards the top of the ballot, and to be given the opportunity to introduce this Bill.

The last two or three months have been very rewarding while I have tried to get myself into a position to present the Bill with some degree of confidence. It is not an exaggeration to say that the day before the ballot was held I was aware of the word "computer" and had heard people talking about software, but about either or both of them I knew little else. I am privileged to introduce this Bill and I am grateful to everyone both within and without the House who has helped me. Without the efforts of so many people it would have been impossible to have reached this stage today. I know that that point will be recognised in the industry.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was right to refer to piracy as a cancer. That is as good a description as any of what has been going wrong in the software industry during the past two years. I hope that when people outside the House debate the implications of the Bill and the future of the industry they will bear in mind the essential truth of the hon. Gentleman's description of this pernicious disease that has been eating away at the prosperity of the industry of the future. No better description has been given. It is a cancer that we must do everything possible to eradicate, and the first step is the passage of this measure.

I thank hon. Members for the manner and style in which they have welcomed the Bill. We listened with care to the remarks of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), and I am sure that his comments will be reflected in the future passage of the Bill.

I am grateful for the generous welcome that the measure received from the official Opposition and from the spokesman for the alliance, the hon. Member for Yeovil, and for the manner in which my hon. Friends—many of whom know much more about the subject, from years of experience, than I do—welcomed it and wished it speed through Parliament. I am sure that their words will have been noted carefully.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) was right to emphasise that the greatest advantage of the measure will be to the consumer. The weakness in the market today is that, because there is no reliable protection against piracy, the consumer, the user, is getting a substandard product. It is not substandard in the sense that video material used to be substandard. In that case the sharks and criminals made appalling copies and sold them at rip-off prices, so that the consumers bought a product that was inferior in quality.

In this case the consumer gets a first-class product in terms of quality of reproduction, but an inferior work. Instead of using software—my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) spoke of how this particularly applies in education — to produce, say, a first-class textbook, which provides an excellent means of using computer software to develop the mind and open up educational advantage and so on, the consumer gets a product which is beautifully produced, with, no doubt, excellent reproduction, but which is, in its intrinsic material, thoroughly substandard and second-rate. If we can reverse that process, the consumer will be the first to gain.

Mr. Wood: I emphasise the point that my hon. Friend has just made. I disagreed with the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) that the development of software was a relatively cheap operation. Some packages can cost hundreds of thousands of pounds, and some can even cost well over £1 million, to develop. What incentive is there for developing such software if, within a few months or even weeks, it can be reproduced for a few pennies?

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend is right and I cannot emphasise the point with greater clarity and force.

I warmly welcomed the Minister's remarks and I will comment on only two aspects of law enforcement. First, it is the intention that in future the law should primarily be enforced through civil remedies. There is no intention on the part of the industry to use the magistrates courts as a first strike weapon to enforce the law against commercial piracy. However, this law will make it much easier to go to the civil courts for civil remedies.

Secondly, because it is uncertain whether copyright law applies to a software product, enforcement of the civil law is chancy and colossally expensive. We should not tolerate that situation any longer and the Minister was right to emphasise that civil remedies will be much more effective as a consequence of the Bill.

The back-up power will be the availability of the criminal courts to deal with outrageous criminal cases. Those powers have been necessary in the video market. I hope that we are acting with sufficient speed to ensure that the criminal network that undermined the video market will not have penetrated computer software as deeply.

The Federation Against Software Theft will set up a unit to monitor what is happening. It will collect evidence of criminal conduct, including offences against the copyright laws, the conspiracy and forgery laws and the Theft Act — for handling and receiving stolen goods. That unit will hand over the evidence to the police who will decide whether the case merits further investigation.

There is no intention that a substitute police force should be established. Nothing could be more damaging to this country's long-term interests than to allow rival police organisations to be set up. The monitoring unit will do no more than present evidence to the police, who will allocate their resources in the proper way, as they do in the ordinary course of their work. I have put that on the record so that everyone knows how it is intended to proceed in that matter.

I am grateful for the kind comments of hon. Members and for the welcome given to the Bill. I am also grateful for the assurance that it will be given a fair wind through the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Hospital Complaints Procedure Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.52 pm

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill springs directly from my own experience in hospital since I was taken seriously ill in January last year with kidney failure. From the months of hospitalisation that followed came the patients' charter which I published in September and from that has come the Bill, which seeks to implement one of the charter's main proposals.

The charter's object was to enhance the status of the hospital patient and to encourage the medical staff—doctors and nurses—to recognise the individual needs of patients and the fact that each patient is a unique human being.

Sometimes during those long days in hospital I felt more like a case history than a person. The doctors had diagnosed my illness; they reckoned that they knew how to treat it, what drugs I required and so on. Every day, they took blood tests and no doubt everything was despatched to the laboratory for analysis and computer readouts.

But what of me, the individual, lying in the hospital bed? I was like every patient who has just found himself in hospital, uncertain and anxious, worried about what is really wrong with him and worried about the future the treatment that he might have to endure. The patient will probably be worried about the support that his wife and family may get at home and uncertain as to whom he should turn to for help and advice. Perhaps one would expect that beside every hospital bed there might be a leaflet to allay some of those fears. I never found such a leaflet beside any of the beds in which I lay in no fewer than three different hospitals during the course of my illness.

Information about the hospital services that are available — times of meals, visiting hours and church services — should be available to any new patient, especially to one as anxious as I was. There should be guidance on how to make a complaint if such a necessity arises. There should be something about sickness benefits, benefits to which one's family is eligible, the library service and on all areas of service in a hospital that impinge directly upon the patient and about which he or she should know. The fact that no such leaflet existed in the three hospitals in which I was a patient—one was a large London general hospital and the others were in Reading and Oxford — shows that hospitals are not thinking as carefully as they might about their patients. It is for that reason that I am introducing the Bill.

It is true that a piece of paper with details about services is not all that a hospital patient requires. I was treated wonderfully by both doctors and nurses over the many months that I was a patient. Of course, the patient who is lying in a hospital bed is anxious about his condition. He will wonder about the future and be concerned about the treatment that he will receive. Patients are lying in alien surroundings and they have probably never met those who are to look after them. They will have no contact with them, at least initially, and, alas, perhaps no sense of trust and confidence.

Nurses still remain the gentle and kind angels that we want them to be, or at least that can be said of 99·9 per cent. of those who treated me. Nurses still know how to give patients assistance at moments of stress. If a nurse holds the patient's hand at that moment, it is worth more than its weight in gold.

Doctors, by necessity, are more awesome characters. If I had not been fortunate enough to be the son of a doctor I think that I would have been more browbeaten by them. I had the advantage over many patients lying in hospital because I knew something of the medical profession whereas they did not.

I have detailed patients' anxiety and sense of concern about the future and I have discovered that these feelings are not peculiar to me. After I published the patients' charter I received a vast amount of mail from all over the country. I received letters from ordinary people who found in my words an expression of their feelings. It is because I believed that I had struck a raw nerve, or a real issue, that I considered it worth while pursuing the charter into legislative form, if that was possible. Therefore, I count myself fortunate to have been drawn No. 12 in the ballot. I have been even more fortunate to find that the Department of Health and Social Security realised that there was something wrong and offered me its services in framing the Bill.

Some will suggest that contact between doctors, nurses and their patients is not all that it might be because the NHS is now treating more patients than ever before and that patients are in hospital for shorter periods than ever before. The time span is so limited that the opportunity for nurses and doctors to get to know their patients is much more limited than it was. Perhaps the amount of work done by doctors and nurses precludes their developing an effective bedside manner. Some of the doctors told me that if they did not have so much paperwork to do they could spend more time on the wards. We should take their point on board. Sometimes I wonder why a secretary is not available to help doctors get through work that could as easily be done for them as by them. Some of the older doctors were much more willing to stop and talk and to answer questions and allay fears.

Although most nurses brought that sympathetic touch of caring and gentleness that we expect of them, some bustled past, apparently bitten by the concept of patients as case histories who had to be fed drugs and not much else.

Lying in my hospital bed, I wondered whether something could be done to improve matters. I shall refer to my experiences, not to impress the House with the fact that I have had a fairly rough time but to show the type of mistakes that can be made in dealing with anyone lying in hospital. I am grateful for the fact that, throughout my period in hospital, no one said, "He is a Member of Parliament. We must give him gold-plated treatment." I never asked for, and I believe that I never received, such treatment. I hope that the fact that I speak as highly as I do of the NHS speaks volumes.

I remember a bad moment after an early dialysis treatment, which is not the easiest treatment to get used to. I felt pretty ghastly after the treatment and hoped that I was being taken back from the dialysis ward to my bed by means of one of those archaic wheelchairs that are still so common in hospitals. I was told that I was required in the X-ray department. I said, "I really feel very ill. May I just get my strength back before I go for an X-ray?" I was told, "Oh no, it is just on the way." I was taken into the X-ray department and I continued to complain about feeling ill. I was helped out of the wheelchair to stand against the screen, and I promptly fainted. I woke up to see many faces looking down on me more or less saying, "What on earth happened to you? How could this possibly be the result of our just wheeling you to the X-ray department?" When I was back in my hospital bed, I wondered how that could have happened. Surely someone somewhere should have said, "If he is not feeling well, it would be better to help him to get better and then X-ray him." To whom does one complain? Who comes to the patient and says, "We have made a mistake."? Does anyone really care, or is this just one more of the hazards of being in a hospital?

The same question arose after I was asked whether I was sensitive to penicillin. I replied that I was and that my GP did not usually give it to me. At that time I had an infection, and I was given a pill, which turned out to be penicillin-based. I suffered the mother and father of a drug rash which, on its own, kept me in hospital for five weeks. When I went home I was in such a poor state that I needed a district nurse to come in every day to dress my feet. Afterwards, I asked, "I said that I was sensitive to penicillin; why did you give it to me?" The answer was, "Oh well, old boy, it was the best antibiotic for your particular infection and we thought that we could take the chance." Whose chance? Whose life? Whose body? Who is the sufferer? What is the compensation? What is the complaints procedure? There appears to be no such procedure. The patient is just the fall guy who is in the hands of doctors who think that they know better than the patient. The doctors did not feel that it was worth while picking up a telephone to ring my GP and ask, "He has told us that he does not get on well with penicillin. Is that really the case?"

In another instance, someone left a stitch in my leg while removing something that was necessary for dialysis. The stitch went septic and I got septicaemia. I still have a wound in my chest as a result of that mistake. Again, to whom do I complain? Who will offer me compensation? Who will listen to my problem? Sadly, no one seems to want to take the blame.

I do not believe that that is good enough. Those experiences of mine can be duplicated, triplicated and quadrupled throughout the country. Too many people who have written to me about my patients' charter have told me about the same type of mistakes and the problems that they too have suffered in hospital. No one comes forward to suggest that something could be done to alleviate those difficulties.

In listing those experiences and the failure to find a complaints procedure that was adequate to meet them, I thought a great deal about how a patient's rightful needs should be met and what type of complaints procedure a hospital should have to deal with them. In my list of complaints I should probably include awkward relationships with the staff. Sometimes those will be inevitable because human beings clash with one another but sometimes there is a failure by the staff to recognise that a patient is the anxious human being that he or she is. There is bad food, mislaid property, dirty washing and lavatory facilities, poor communications between doctors and nurses and their patients, failure by the medical staff to advise and consult relations, a lack of communication between departments in the same hospital, causing unnecessary distress to the patients, and mistakes causing distress and suffering to patients. On the last point, there is a powerful case for some form of automatic compensation — a system of insurance for hospital patients to cover them against time off work, minor disfigurements through unexpected surgery, drug rashes and other minor errors. I know that someone will say, "What is a minor error, and what is a major or more serious error?"

I do not believe that it is impossible for the Health Service to devise some form of limiting factor. I know that in a case such as mine, I have cause for compensation, but I also know that if I were to go through the present procedures not only would they be unbelievably drawn-out — probably covering years — they would cost me a fortune and I should probably obtain minor damages. I should have been able to take out an insurance policy when I first went into hospital. It could be devised in such a way that something would be available.

Before we worry about compensation any further, and we should worry about it because the present system is extremely inefficient and long-winded, we should return to my first suggestion of a leaflet beside each hospital bed for every new inpatient—a short statement of what is available to him or her and how, if they wish to make a complaint, they can do so. I believe that that is a first step in an effective hospital complaints procedure. What is more, hospital complaints generally should be handled by a senior member of the hospital staff and not treated solely at ward level. That member of the senior hospital staff should be on a par with the consultant, the surgeon and the senior nursing officer. He should, in effect, be the hospital's ombudsman. To my mind, the unit administrator would seem a natural choice for that appointment. All complaints should be directed to that person. There are some who believe that complaints should not just be directed to a person in the hospital but should be reported to the district health authority.

A member of the Portsmouth and South-East Hampshire health authority wrote to me about my Bill and said:

"It must be a fundamental obligation of District Health Authorities and they should be required to receive regular reports on the response given by patients, both during their period of treatment and also after their discharge. This need not be an enormous bureaucratic exercise, but could be done on a sample basis. Quite frankly I would not be happy at simply relying on doctors and nurses to necessarily report the views of patients accurately. If I can quote one small example, recently in one of our district general hospitals in Portsmouth, we undertook a patient satisfaction survey of the catering services. Questionnaires were designed for patients to complete and the questionnaires were delivered to each ward with an explanation given by a member of the Catering Manager's staff to each Ward Sister on how and when the form should be completed. Several Ward Sisters were extremely diffident about the exercise and said that they would complete the forms on the patients' behalf because the patients were not capable of completing the forms properly. Fortunately the Assistant Catering Manager assisted and ensured that the forms were completed by the patients. Discussions with clinical staff are frequently as disappointing. All too often one meets the comment 'We really know what is best for the patient'."

The person who sent me that letter goes on to say:

"The sad thing is that the NHS is a marvellous institution and in terms of the commitment from the general public, it is extremely fortunate. It has got some fantastic staff who work for the real sense of commitment and dedication, and I think many of them who inadvertently fail to recognise patients' real feelings would be concerned and upset if they were really aware of the sorrow and anxiety that patients do suffer."

It may be argued that some complaints of a very minor nature need not go through the complaints procedure that

I have suggested. I am not sure about that. Perhaps if somebody wants to complain about the lunch today or the supper tonight, that really is not a matter for the hospital ombudsman. But, generally speaking, I believe that complaints should go to that person in the hospital who is detailed to look after them. The consultant in the case of medical complaints, the senior surgeon in the case of surgery, and the senior nursing officer in the case of nurses, should be informed about whatever complaints have been made. I stress that I am talking about minor complaints.

I return to the point that I have made several times before—that we must recognise that a patient lying ill in bed in hospital is an anxious person. That person will be nervous of making a serious complaint against a nurse or a member of the medical staff because of a fear of reprisals or that someone may be vindictive. That is why I believe that a third party is so crucial.

I repeat that what is wanted is a member of the hospital staff whose responsibility is to follow up complaints for and on behalf of the complainant, and someone who is not frightened of running up against a senior member of the staff, doctor or nurse to ensure that the inquiries are completed satisfactorily — in effect, a hospital troubleshooter. To some extent I find myself in that extraordinary position.

I have received letters from other patients in the hospital that I am currently attending for dialysis treatment. People that I have not seen before are bringing me their complaints and saying, "Since you are a Member of Parliament, will you do something for me?" I do what I can. It seems extraordinary to me that such people who are not my constituents feel that because I have the magic initials after my name, I can do something. In so far as I can, I do. If I tell my hon. Friend the Minister that members of the nursing staff have also asked me whether I can do something, particularly about the supply of laundry to the wards, he might realise that there is quite a task to be done to ensure that the complaints not only of patients but even of the nursing staff are properly handled.

Of course, it may be said that while I am talking about patients complaining, there is no particular reason why the hospital staff itself should not go out of their way to discover whether there are complaints. I suggest that it would be no bad thing if doctors and senior nurses asked patients whether everything was all right, if they consulted relatives of patients to find out whether the patient had told them something that he had been nervous of telling nurses or doctors. Sometimes it is undoubtedly true that patients will tell their wives and those close to them about their worries, while they will hide those same worries from those who are looking after them. My correspondent from the Portsmouth and South East Hampshire health authority told me in his letter that the Harrow health care centre, in his words,

"hands out on a routine basis questionnaires to patients asking them fundamental questions like 'Did you like your doctor?', 'Did you have confidence in him?', 'Did you feel that he told you all you needed and wished to know?'"

If the Harrow health care centre can take that attitude towards its patients, I do not see why large general hospitals could not do something similar.

From what I have said, I wish to underline that I am in no way trying to suggest that going to hospital is a terrifying experience or that one will be badly treated or have endless grounds for complaint—in fact, quite the contrary. However, that mistakes are made I hope I have illustrated, and that patients have cause for concern is undoubted. If anyone wants to see the correspondence that I have received about my patients' charter, he is welcome to do so.

I repeat that all of us can have the greatest respect for the doctors, nurses and domestic staff in our National Health Service hospitals. We can be satisfied, by and large, that they treat those in their care as well as they can. I suppose that what I am really complaining about is a lack of communication. I am also complaining about the fact that those who look after patients do not attempt enough to discover what the patient is feeling and so build up his or her confidence and help the patient to get better.

However, as we all know, all human institutions have shortcomings and failings. I believe that a practical and easily understood complaints procedure common to all hospitals is badly needed. I am aware that some hospitals have already introduced a complaints procedure. I am particularly delighted to say that my own Newbury district hospital has produced an authoritative document. However, I have not been an inpatient in that hospital, so have not had the chance to try out its procedure. Nevertheless, I know that it exists, and that shows that some hospital authorities have thought about the subject and felt that something should be done.

I believe that something on a nationwide basis is needed. Because it does not exist now, it is a serious omission from the effectiveness of the Health Service when it is applied to hospitals. Because I believe that the omission can be put right by the Bill, I commend it to the House.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): It is a privilege to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who after a period of suffering, which we recognise was real, is sitting here at least substantially restored to health as a result of the efforts of the NHS. He warmly expressed his gratitude to that service, yet in his duty as a Member of the House, having recognised that there are real shortcomings, has not been shy in bringing them forward to the House and the public.

I endorse what my hon. Friend has said because many years ago I too had great reason to be grateful to the NHS when it repaired my detached retinas with great skill. I was off work for only two months and I suffered none of the difficulties that my hon. Friend suffered. But, having practised in the courts for 20 years and having done a significant amount of practice of a medical nature, I know only too well of the problems which he describes. I also know them only too well from, in a sense, the inside, because my father-in-law, Professor Charles Fletcher, has made a particular study of communications in medicine. Although he has now retired, he continues to lecture and he has published works on the enormous importance of those in the medical profession being able to communicate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will accept that, despite his father-in-law's retirement, we remain grateful for the advice that we have had from Professor Fletcher and for the continuing advice that we receive from him.

Mr. Lyell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend.

The medical profession is understanding more and more the importance of communication, but there is still a long way to go. It should be a requirement is every medical school that there is at least a significant period of formal training for young doctors as to how they should approach the patient. They should realise just how vulnerable a patient is, even if everything is done with the best of intentions.

On a lighter note, but with a serious undertone, let me tell the House of a story told to me by my general practitioner about my former general practitioner who is no longer alive. He was the very best of doctors and would undoubtedly have done everything that he could to communicate. But when his successor took over a patient told him that she had finished the course of pills which had been given to her by the doctor's predecessor but that they did not seem to be working. She said, "I have been taking them exactly as he told me every 46 hours." A moment's reflection will show how that misunderstanding occurred and yet nobody would put it down to the fault of the doctor. Happily, the pills were taken every four to six hours for the following three weeks and began to have a rapid and beneficial effect!

The undertone of that is that people are extremely lost and vulnerable when they enter a strange world. I remember feeling exactly the same when I entered hospital, although it turned out to be for only a comparatively short period. I remember having something explained to me and I was told that I had some "D" mark in my eye. I kept asked what "D" mark was. I thought that I was moderately well educated but I was not familiar with the medical expression "oedema". I was continually told that there was oedema which I picked up as "D" mark. That was a small hospital with the highest standards of treatment and the kindest communication. In enormous general hospitals, and in any hospital, there is tremendous pressure. People can feel much more lost and worried than many practitioners realise.

I re-emphasise that my gratitude to the Health Service is colossal. The dedication of the staff—doctors, nurses, administrators and ancillary staff—in the face of all sorts of difficulties is real and noticeable. Against that background of appreciation, and drawing on my experience in the courts, I want to make another serious point to the medical profession which I hope will be noted, considered and acted upon. It relates to circumstances in which it is necessary to pursue and investigate a serious complaint which may lead to a claim for compensation.

As the House knows, all doctors are required to be insured and I do not think that any doctor practising in the medical profession would be uninsured. The Medical Protection Society and the Medical Defence Union, for which I have had the privilege of acting on a number of occasions, exist to look after doctors' interests. The patient, however, is not insured and finds himself in an alien world. In theory, much has been done to improve the ease with which patients can get hold of their notes to pursue an investigation, but in practice it is still extremely difficult. Objections are raised to the patient seeing the notes, to more than one doctor seeing them or to their being passed to lawyers, as is essential if a case is to be properly regarded. It is said that the patient may suffer if he sees the notes, or that doctors will be less open if the notes are not completey protected, but I believe that such anxieties are exaggerated in the minds of those who express them. The risk to the patient is very small. Advisers, whether they be medical or legal or simply friends, will take care of the notes and not allow worries to be exaggerated. The notes should therefore be far more easily available.

My second serious comment is that members of the medical profession are far too reluctant to come forward and give evidence when it is justified in negligence cases. It is extraordinarily difficult to persuade experts to give an independent opinion and, if necessary, to support it in the courts. Here I declare an interest as to some extent it is my pleasure and profit to act in such cases, although I have not done so for some time and it is no significant part of my current activities.

It is wrong that a great and rightly privileged profession should not be prepared to see justice done in cases involving its own members. Such cases are often very complex and involve questions of judgment. Consultants and other specialists should not stand back from giving an honest and open opinion, if necessary backed in the courts, if that is the only way in which justice can be achieved.

It is sometimes argued that the British Medical Association or the General Medical Council is reluctant to keep lists of specialits as that might constitute the advertisement of skills, but I do not believe that there is any merit in that argument, if indeed it is still around. I appreciate that it might be embarrassing for one practitioner to have to give evidence against another, especially in a narrow field in which they might be friends or colleagues, but the same problems arise for lawyers, architects, accountants, chartered surveyors, and so on, and in all my long experience I have not found members of those professions unwilling to come forward in an open and responsible way. In this respect, the medical profession falls short of what the public are entitled to expect and I hope that it will take serious note of my comments, which are made in a spirit of kindliness and great support for its members' professional judgment and skill and the benefits that they provide for the community.

I turn to consider some of the specific points raised in the Bill. There is enormous merit in the setting up of a formal complaints procedure of exactly the type envisaged in the Bill. The fact that such a procedure exists and that it is open will help to overcome some of the problems, at a graver level, that might sometimes lead to litigation. I emphasise that I have no wish to see us follow the Americans into endless claims. Indeed, I know very well that my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has no wish to see that.

However, anxious patients who believe that they have a genuine complaint should have the opportunity to air it. In a high proportion of cases—I suspect in the majority of them—it will lead to the rapid reassurance that the profession would have wished to give if it had only known about the complaint. In the small minority of cases where the matter is more serious, justice can only enhance the profession's prestige.

I warmly welcome and strongly support the Bill, and I hope that it will find a rapid route to the statute book.

1.35 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On behalf of the Labour party I warmly welcome the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson). Although we have jousted almost personally on one or two issues in the past, I was delighted to be sitting on the Front Bench last year when he returned to the House. I think that we all welcomed his return, particularly as we had heard such horrifying stories about the nature of the things that had been wrong with him, and about the accidents that had happened to him while in hospital. I hope that it will not sound at all patronising if I say that it is inestimably to his credit that, on coming out of hospital and returning to work, he paid great tribute to the NHS and to those who had helped him. Unlike most of us, he was capable of distinguishing between what people had been trying to do and what had gone wrong.

There can be no greater justification for private Member's Bills than that a Member of Parliament who has had painful and distasteful experiences should try to help others by changing the law. That is one of the perfect justifications for a freely elected Parliament. However, I hope that I am not being too party political if I say that when arguing against private medicine and in favour of the NHS, I always stress that one of the virtues of having everyone reliant on the NHS is that people in influential positions can get corrected something that has gone wrong. Conversely, if people in influential positions opt out of the NHS, things can go wrong without them even knowing about it.

It is extremely commendable that the hon. Member for Newbury should have introduced this Bill. We shall seek to ensure that it gets through all its stages as quickly as possible, as we should like to see it enshrined in law. It is sometimes not recognised by those who theorise that patients in hospital are ill. That is why they are there. Those who feel ill are not usually feeling their best. If one is down, in pain, confused and vulnerable, when something goes wrong one is more disturbed than one might be at home, or even in the House of Commons.

People in hospital are ill and vulnerable. Many patients are in awe of doctors and nurses and many are also affected by a sense of gratitude to all the people who are trying to make them well. As a result legitimate complaints are not voiced by patients because they feel that they would appear ungrateful or that they would be regarded as trouble makers if they drew attention to things that were not going right for them.

We must make it easier for hospital patients to have their complaints dealt with properly. The exceptionally well informed hon. Member for Newbury found it difficult to put messages across when he was receiving treatment in hospital. Many patients are not as well informed and confident and are not the offspring of a doctor. They have enormous difficulties making their views known. We must ensure that there is a complaints system about which everybody knows and of which everybody can make use.

I have something of an obsession about complaints procedures because before I came to the House I worked for the local government ombudsman and dealt with complaints all the time.

People working in hospitals might be perturbed that Parliament should require a complaints procedure. There is no better way of describing the procedure than John Milton's immortal words:

"when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty attained".

A good effective complaints procedure would be of advantage, not only to patients, but to people working in hospitals.

It is probably best for people with a complaint to turn first to the person about whom they are complaining or the person who is responsible for that aspect of the hospital service. However, a procedure to log complaints is still necessary. I am not talking about the need for a formal procedure to roll into operation, but logging complaints is important.

It is often difficult to complain to the person about whom one is complaining. It can be difficult if one is having a rough time with a nurse or doctor to say that one does not like what is going on. It might be easier to complain to someone else about the person who is causing the upset.

A formal complaints procedure would be to the advantage of the people working in the hospitals. We should all learn from our mistakes. If a hospital is properly organised and logs all complaints, the complaints can be used as a tool of management to identify people who are square pegs in round holes, or procedures that lead to complaints. Improvements could be made, as a result of a complaint, to the physical layout of a ward or clinic. If the hospital management makes proper use of the complaints procedure, not only will that benefit the individual making the complaint, it will enable the hospital to provide a better service by identifying what is going wrong and putting it right.

One thing that distinguishes our system of health care from that in the United States—to the inestimable credit of our system—is the absence of the massive amount of legal activity and litigation that prevails in the American system. Operations carried out by surgeons in the United States are described in some circumstances as defensive surgery — to defend surgeons against possible legal action if something has gone wrong. That is medical madness, and must be avoided.

Mr. John Patten: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman—who for the purposes of this debate is my hon. Friend—for giving way. Is he aware that in some American hospitals the staff includes moral philosophers, who are employed by the hospitals to advise surgeons on the moral choices that they face before taking decisions?

Mr. Dobson: They may be moral philosophers, but in line with everything else in the United States I suspect that they are concerned more with money than with morality. They are probably advising the surgeon that he will be safer in court rather than in the eyes of his fellow human beings or of whichever God he may subscribe to. It is more likely to be legal than moral advice.

I firmly believe that the stronger and more effective the sytem of complaints procedures in our National Health Service—both in general practice and in hospitals—the less likely we are to get into the mad position of having lawyers shuffling all over the place. Lawyers are a desperate necessity and their services should be avoided almost at all costs. We do not want the position that prevails in the United States, where if someone wants to complain about a hospital he has to do it via a writ or a claim for damages. Such a system is to the advantage only of the legal profession, and certainly not to the advantage of the patient or the medical profession.

As my constituency includes Lincoln's Inn and Gray's Inn, I may be risking a few votes at the next general election. However, I believe that the only proper place for a lawyer in a hospital is as a patient and not as a participant.

I welcome the Bill because it will be to the advantage of patients and the majority of people who are working in the hospital service who want only to improve the services to patients. It will help those responsible for managing the hospital service to manage it better and will help keep the lawyers out of our system of health care.

I hope that the Bill will go through all its stages today, get to the House of Lords and become law as quickly as possible. That will be a great tribute to the way that the hon. Member for Newbury has turned his experiences to the advantage of everyone else. We envy him that.

1.50 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I fear that I must speak as a desperate necessity who is to be avoided at all costs and as one who should be in hospital as a patient. In the face of such an attack on myself and many others, I have a rare opportunity to speak about the Bill.

Having nailed my colours firmly to the mast, I join in the congratulations that have been offered to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson). Hon. Members will wish him and his Bill every success. No hon. Member is better qualified to introduce such a measure, and he did so with experience, aplomb and true knowledge of the subject, having been through the system in the way he described. My hon. Friend deserves as well with his measure as any hon. Member ever has with a private Member's Bill. I say that in the knowledge that I have wished him even greater success than I would have wished on myself in the preceding debate, when I introduced my private Member's Bill.

All hon. Members have experienced, through our constituents, circumstances which have made us wish that a satisfactory and reliable complaints procedure existed for hospitals. Constituents come to us with complaints about the way in which they, their families or friends have been treated in hospital. Sometimes those complaints are not justified; they are the product of a chemistry between two persons who have not been able to hit it off, with one side not having been able to accept the good will and status of the other.

Sometimes, however, not just personal relations but the system fails. It is to remedy that defect that the Bill is designed, and for that purpose it proposes an important and necessary change. I have no doubt that it will not be necessary to resort to its procedures often, because the overwhelming majority of those who go to hospital—as patients or when visiting families or friends who are ill—have nothing but the highest praise for the nursing, consideration, courtesy and good will that the staff show to patients.

Notwithstanding the desire of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) to send me to hospital as quickly as he can—though I must remind him that, having been called to the Bar by Lincoln's Inn in his constituency, I am affronted by his suggestion that I should be in hospital——

Mr. Dobson: I interrupt the hon. Gentleman because he may have misheard me. I said that the only proper role for a lawyer in hospital was as a patient. I did not say that all lawyers should be hospital patients.

Mr. Powell: I am grateful for that intervention. In view of the hon. Gentleman's good will towards the Bill, it would be churlish of me to insist on an interpretation of his words, which seemed to me to be consistent with his general drift. Therefore, I do not do so.

This is a first-class Bill, introduced by an outstanding Member in the best possible cause. No Bill could be more warmly welcomed by the House. I welcome it unreservedly.

1.55 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): The Government welcome the Bill, and I welcome the chance to speak briefly about our support for it.

I pay tribute to the commitment and energy of my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who has displayed his customary concern for others, in circumstances in which many others would have been concerned only with their own problems. The whole House admires his attitude. Everyone who has taken part in the debate has paid tribute to my hon. Friend, and I found his speech intensely moving and interesting.

I echo the handsome compliments paid by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, who has demonstrated his concern to maintain and improve the quality of services offered by the NHS. We all share that concern and all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate have paid tribute to the skill and dedication of those who work in the NHS. The Government applaud those sentiments.

We have heard about the work of doctors and nurses, but we should not forget the ancillary and paramedical staff, who play an integral part in good hospital care. The involvement of ancillary staff can be critical in creating the atmosphere of contentment in our great NHS hospitals, whether large or small. We have benefited from the valuable perspective of my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury as a recent recipient of health services. That perspective has prompted him to bring forward the Bill, which is designed to ensure that the NHS deals more effectively, according to his lights, with complaints.

We have had some interesting reflections on the nature of the NHS complaints procedure from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras and, particularly, from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), whose 20 years of practice in the courts, sometimes involved with these issues, has given him the knowledge and experience with which to speak freely and in detail.

We also heard interesting views from my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), whose own Bill moved forward one stage earlier today. It is characteristic of his assiduity as an hon. Member and of his interest in the welfare of his constituents that he should have stayed on to speak in yet another debate; some hon. Members might have given in to the temptation to repair to a place of refreshment to celebrate the progress of a Bill of their own.

The basis of everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury is intent on doing finds its source in his view that the National Health Service needs a patients' charter. That is a great issue. My hon. Friend first wrote to the Department in September 1984 to put forward his 10-point patients' charter. I think that he realises that these are complicated issues that require perhaps step-by-step movement and much detailed consultation with all those involved in our hospitals.

The concept of the charter and the themes raised in it are far-reaching. For example, point No. 2 is:

"No patient shall be prescribed powerful drugs until the hospital concerned has been in touch with the patient's general practitioner."

My hon. Friend was too modest to refer to the matters set out in the charter, so I shall do it for him. The third point is that new patients must be covered by an insurance policy when they enter hospital.

These matters and the range of others are most thought-provoking. I am not saying that the Government support them or oppose them. I am merely saying that they are thought-provoking for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself in our continuing review of NHS policy. I hope that they are thought-provoking for the medical community at large.

Apart from beginning to pilot the Bill through the House, my hon. Friend has begun to promote perhaps a slightly overdue debate in the NHS and medical circles about the nature of the complaints procedure and the responsiveness of the NHS to those we collectively hope to serve. I pay tribute to him for getting the debate going.

Nothing could have shown more clearly the need for the debate than my hon. Friend's reference to the lack of information that he experienced, at least on one occasion, while he was in hospital. There was no leaflet next to his bed, and he was given no information about church services and other forms of help which so many patients entering a hospital would seek. We expect those who run our hospitals to provide that sort of information and to make it freely available. It is wrong that that information has not been given. I am sure that that view is shared by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras.

Building on his experience, my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has decided to initiate a debate on the nature of the responsiveness of the NHS to its consumers and the nature of the complaints procedure which, alas and alack, we must have. He has done that and has introduced an important hospital complaints procedure with, I think, the support of the whole House.

The Government are concerned to increase the consumer responsiveness of the NHS. It must be more sensitive to the needs and wishes of patients. One of the key components of the recent NHS management inquiry report produced for us by Roy Griffiths and his colleagues was the importance of assessing and ensuring consumer satisfaction. In the talks about management changes that have flowed from our acceptance of the results of the inquiry as set out in the report, what Roy Griffiths and his colleagues had to say about the importance of listening to the consumer—the patient—has been rather overlooked. That is another reason for our being grateful to my hon. Friend for introducing the Bill.

The improvements that I hope the Government are introducing into the management of the NHS are designed, among other things, to bring decision making closer to the patient and to begin to try to pinpoint exactly who is responsible for doing what at all stages in our hospitals. The introduction of general managers is providing an opportunity to stimulate initiative, energy and vitality in the management function. One necessary element in achieving this is the need to give proper attention to the needs of patients, or consumers. It is essential that NHS managers should know how well services are being delivered. The patients must be a valuable source of information. One should not simply ask the politicians, doctors, nurses, paramedicals, ancillaries, trade unionists and everyone else involved in the delivery of the service how the NHS is run. One should also ask the patients. That must be one of the touchstones of good, hard, hands-on management in the NHS. Managers should be seen to be taking account of what patients say about the NHS.

The NHS already has a quite well-established complaints procedure in hospitals on the basis of guidance that we issue to the NHS, most recently in 1981. That advice emphasises a speedy, thorough and open response at the local level as the best approach to a complaint by a patient or relative. We expect health authorities to deal firmly and fully with complaints and to ensure that complainants receive informative and frank explanation. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury that it is possible to sort out these problems quickly by immediate intervention by management, consultants, or nurse managers. I appreciate the point made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about the difficulty of complaining to a person about whom one has a complaint. There are intrinsic difficulties in that process.

If a complainant remains dissatisfied, there are established procedures for a further review of the case at a higher level in the service by officers or, perhaps, by members of the authority. Those procedures are laid down in health notice HC(81)5 which was circulated in April 1981. Every Health Service manager has a copy of "Health Services Management: Health Service Complaints Procedure". There is much good basic guidance in that document.

In addition to the NHS complaints procedure, the independent office of the Health Service Commissioner can investigate patients' grievances. He has the power to investigate complaints about the actions of a health authority involving an alleged failure in service, or failure in service provision or maladministration. About 120 cases a year are investigated by the Health Service Commissioner.

It may be of interest for the House to know how the present complaints procedure works. Each year in England there are about 6 million inpatient admissions and almost 50 million episodes of outpatient treatment or treatment in accident and emergency departments. In 1983, 19,000 written complaints were received, or about one for every 3,000 episodes of treatment. Although it is a comparatively small figure given the overall volume of NHS activity, which is prodigiously large, 19,000 written complaints represent a considerable body of patients with grievances so great that they decided to write about them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has received letters from not only fellow patients in the hospital which is treating him so well but—I was slightly grieved to hear this—from nursing staff in hospitals. The number of complaints has been growing in recent years. It is generally accepted that most complaints are made not to obtain financial compensation or to give a useful indoor relief to the lawyers — this point worried the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras—but to obtain an adequate explanation as to why an action took place in a particular way. The lessons learnt from the volume of complaints can be valuable.

[Mr. John Patten]

The Bill is in line with the Government's aims for a more responsible NHS. It would be one step further—should it pass into law—towards achieving a better Health Service. In many ways, the duty that the Bill would lay on the Secretary of State is already fulfilled. The legislation would also provide a vehicle for the improvement of current procedures, to which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire referred in his eloquent remarks. It will also give a valuable impetus to the drive for better services.

My hon. Friend's Bill furnishes an opportunity for us to re-examine our complaints procedure. We should of course do that in full consultation with the medical and other health professions and with patients. We would determine with them the precise shape of the complaints procedure that the NHS needs to hear the patients' voice, to examine, critically perhaps, its own actions, and, most importantly, to act on the findings of those discussions. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us that opportunity and impetus.

The Bill will also provide us with a valuable opportunity to consider the available publicity material. A complaints procedure about which no one knows is of no use to anyone. We must do better. If my hon. Friend was let down and was not given the information that he felt he needed, we must do better and ensure that our hospitals give that information. That is not to say that people should be encouraged to complain unreasonably about the superb service which the NHS generally provides. My hon. Friend and my hon. and learned Friend paid tribute to that.

We must be satisfied that we are not discouraging patients from voicing their legitimate anxieties. That is most important not just for patients but for the parents and relatives of those who are in hospital. They should feel much freer than hitherto they have felt to talk to staff about services and any queries that they may have. Staff should not feel inhibited from discussing such matters with complainants.

Many complaints arise out of a sense of frustration—the feeling that people do not want to talk and give information. It is difficult to legislate about that. It requires major changes in the training regime for young doctors, nurses, paramedicals, and ancillaries who do such an important job in our hospitals. It is as true now as it ever has been that good communications between staff and patients will go a long way to reducing the number of complaints and the need for action which will undoubtedly flow from my hon. Friend's Bill.

The Bill will provide my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State with an opportunity to consider afresh all the elements on which I have touched briefly, and perhaps to introduce a statutory complaints procedure which commands the confidence of patients and staff. It should make a real contribution towards the provision of a more consumer-responsive NHS. It is a duty which, as I said at the outset of my remarks, the Government welcome. We are most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us the opportunity to welcome it.

2.13 pm

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: I must first thank all those hon. Members who have so kindly spoken about my Bill in such complimentary terms. May I take up, especially, the kind words of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and follow one thing that he said which is accurate and to the point—that when complaints are aired things are put right which are then not wrong for someone who comes afterwards. Complaints help to improve services generally for today and the future. We should see the complaints procedure in that light.

The second point I should like to make is to remind the House that there are between 1,100 and 1,200 complaints to each local health authority each year. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, that is a large number. That may be the tip of the iceberg or it may be the iceberg itself; I do not think that any of us are sure. But the more we can let patients air their views, the better Health Service we shall have.

I remind the House that Professor Andrew Matthews of St. George's hospital in London told the British Association for the Advancement of Science that, in his experience, the better a patient was informed about his treatment and about the way that he was being looked after in hospital, the less was his reliance on pain-killing drugs and the quicker was his cure. That again underlines the need for communications between the medical staff and patients.

I thank the Minister for his very kind words about my Bill and about myself. I thank him also for the many things that he has told us about how sensitive the Government are to the need to improve the consumer protection side of the Health Service—for that, after all, is what I am talking about. We all recognise that there is a shortcoming in terms of a complaints procedure, and I hope that the Bill will make good that omission.

Companies (Political Donations) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.18 pm

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When I was fortunate enough —if that is the right term —to draw No. 18 in the ballot for private Members' Bills, I was offered different types of advice. Some hon. Members said to me, "Introduce a Bill that is non-contentious and that will gain support from all parts of the House. Then you can get a piece of legislation through and it will be remembered as the Fatchett Act. Alternatively, you can go down in a blaze of glory that will make a major political propaganda point and be forgotten by lunchtime." I decided to adopt the former course and to introduce a measure that is clearly non-contentious, that is designed to extend democracy in our society, and that should therefore gain the support of all sections of the House. It may well be that the spirit that has pervaded the House today, with two Bills making rapid progress, will also affect this Bill. It is a measure about extending democracy to shareholders in companies. It is about extending rights. Therefore, I should have thought that it was an important part of the political process in society.

I should like to deal with one or two criticisms that might be made of the Bill. Some Conservative Members might suggest that the Bill is an attack upon the funds of the Conservative party. They will call in aid evidence that in 1983-84 the Conservative party received £2,780,000 worth of donations from private companies. They will say that what I am trying to do is stop companies donating to the Conservative party. That is not my intention, but if Conservative Members feel guilty about company donations, they may come to that conclusion.

My intention is to give shareholders the right to have a say in those decisions. Surely no Conservative Member could object to that. It would simply be a case of company shareholders saying that they agreed that their company should have a political fund and be able to make donations. If we go through that democratic process, shareholders might agree to continue to donate funds to the Conservative party, although that would be surprising, judging by the value that they get for that money. In view of the way in which the country's economy has been managed over the past few years, I should have thought that it was not necessarily the best investment to make on behalf of shareholders. However, after a ballot and through the processes that my Bill sets out, the company shareholders might decide that it would be in their interests to vote the moneys to the Labour party. That would probably be a much better investment because they would have a much more sensible management of the economy, and they could look forward to their company growing and perhaps to greater dividends being paid on higher profits.

Therefore, the Bill is not an attack on funds given to the Conservative party, nor is it an attack upon companies with directors who have received honours from the Prime Minister in the new year's or birthday honours lists. One or two of my right hon. and hon. Friends have referred to the relationship between company donations and mentions in the honours list, but it would be scurrilous to suggest that directors donate to the Conservative party simply to get a mention in the honours list. There must be a much better reason for donating to the Conservative party, although as yet I have not found one that would make sound financial sense.

Therefore, the Bill is not an attack on the Conservative party or company directors. It is a modest Bill. On other occasions I have called it the shareholders' charter. It is an attempt to extend to shareholders the rights that trade unionists have enjoyed since 1913. If any Conservative Members oppose the Bill, they will be telling the country that they expect trade unions to hold ballots, give individuals the right to opt out, and have separate political funds for the payment of political donations, but that they do not expect any such controls or constraints on companies. It would be strange if there were such opposition because Conservative Members would be saying that they agreed that there should be a law for trade unions, but that there should not be the same application of that law for companies. When I look at Conservative Benches and see reasonable men — I include all Conservative Members present—I would expect them to put first the interests of the political system, not the interests of their own political party, and that what they would like is fairness in political donations so that trade unions and companies work on the same basis.

Therefore, the Bill attempts to provide rights for shareholders that they have not enjoyed previously. The Bill could have gone about that in several ways. First, I could simply have introduced a clause that said that companies could not make political donations. I could have sought to make illegal political donations either to the Conservative party or to front organisations. However, this is a modest measure, which does not attempt to be that far-reaching. I am seeking consensus.

I believe, as I am sure Conservative Members do, that it is part of our political process that the great institutions of our society donate to political parties and political organisations. Therefore, I do not want to make it illegal in that sense.

But if I did, I would have some support from companies. The chairman of Cadbury Schweppes, Sir Adrian Cadbury, may well have supported the measure. He was reported in the Financial Times on 23 January 1984 as having said:

> "Boards of directors should consider stopping political contributions and instead pay the equivalent in higher dividends to allow shareholders to decide whether to donate."

It is most unfortunate that Cadbury Schweppes did not listen to the excellent advice of its chairman. During the course of that year the organisation donated £15,000 to the Conservative party. Nevertheless, I could have taken Sir Adrian Cadbury's advice and simply introduced a Bill that said that there should be no political donations and that if shareholders wanted to donate to the Conservative party, or to the alliance, they could do so. I notice that no alliance Member is present. One of the great advantages of being an alliance Member is that the alliance has already introduced the shorter working week.

Instead, I have sought to build upon the existing institutions and the fact that companies do donate, and I have sought to allow such donations to continue. I am trying to take from companies the right that they seem to exercise through their directors at the moment without any consultation whatever with shareholders.

Let me draw attention to some of the problems that have been experienced by Gwent county council's superannuation fund. Employees of Gwent county council pay into that fund. Looking at the political map of that part of the country I suspect that many of them are, wisely, Labour party voters. Gwent county council, probably feeling some of the democratic wishes of its employees, decided that it would examine the companies in which that fund invested to discover whether they donated to the Conservative party. The council then wrote to the companies and asked whether, if they did donate to the Conservative party, they would consider the possibility of no longer doing so because the pension fund would not be in favour of such donations.

For example, the council wrote to the Sedgwick group, an organisation in which the Gwent county council had investment funds. The group replied:

"This is not a matter in which shareholders can be involved."

That shows a great belief in democracy, does it not? I cannot imagine the General Secretary of the TUC saying that trade unionists should not be involved. The horror of Conservative Members would be unbelievable. It would be synthetic, but it would be unbelievable.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South) rose——

Mr. Fatchett: No, I shall not give way.

The Hambro group, in which Gwent county council also invested, said:

"The board reserves the right to act in accordance with its views."

That is a lovely democratic principle, is it not? One or two of my hon. Friends may say that company directors make such bizarre decisions on occasions that they appear not to act in accordance with their own views. But Hambro's belief in shareholders' democracy is so great that it says that the board of directors will act in accordance with its own views.

My modest Bill would extend to shareholders the right to a ballot. It would tell directors that they have a responsibility to consult individual shareholders before they use company money for political donations, just like a trade union. There would have to be a ballot to set up a political fund, and it would be at that point that the shareholders would choose whether they wanted their company to participate. They may say that they do not want their company to invest or spend money in that way, but that would be a democratic decision.

Who are we, having been elected by the democratic process, to deny the value and validity of that process? I cannot imagine any Conservative Members saying that they would disagree with such a decision. There will thus be a decision to set up a political fund. There will also be a right for individual shareholders to opt out of contributing to political donations. We may later wish to extend that to individual employees, who create the company's wealth, or to consumers who probably make a donation to the Conservative party every time they go into a public house. I am attracted by the idea of a non-Conservative party beer; that is a very populist issue. People could then opt out of the political levy. At present, however, the Bill extends that right only to shareholders——

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 27th February proceedings on the business selected in pursuance of paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of public business) shall, if not previously concluded, lapse at Seven o'clock and shall be counted as a half day as provided by that Order.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Professional Boxing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.32 pm

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): The Times in a notable leader last year commented:

"Boxing has a long history often invested with glamour. It is seen as a trial of courage and strength, a producer of heroes, a ritualisation of the combats by which mankind has developed. It has enabled a few exceptional individuals to escape from poverty and racial discrimination and rise to wealth and fame. It is held to have practical value in developing character and skill in self-defence. It is enjoyed by many spectators and it earns a lot of money for some businessmen."

It continued that banning boxing

"would be an unwarranted interference with individual liberty. It is perfectly legal to damage oneself with alcohol, nicotine and other permitted drugs. It is even legal to commit suicide. Boxing is voluntary for those who receive the damage as well as for those who inflict it."

The brain does not distinguish between the impact of an amateur or a professional glove, a football, a fist or shoulder in a rugby scrum, or the ground as a jockey falls from a horse. Hang-gliding, pot-holing, rock-climbing and other dangerous pursuits are not sports that I pursue and I share the concern at the enormous cost in money and human life when such high-risk sports go wrong and rescue operations have to be mounted. Nevertheless, I strongly respect the right of the individual to choose his own destiny.

To those people who would ban boxing on the grounds that it is dangerous, I put the facts. Yes, it is one of many dangerous sports. It is a tragedy that there have been 10 deaths in professional boxing in this country since 1945, of which six were British, one due to aspirin sensitivity. Yet over 480 people died in sport between the years of 1969 and 1981 alone. What of mountaineering, horse riding, football and rugby, where in each case the figures for deaths are higher? What of smoking and drinking? Would those who seek to ban boxing logically extend their argument and ban them? Stringent medical safeguards, popular support and willingness to discuss the moral and ethical issues concerned with professional boxing are essential to the success of the sport. The price for boxing's future will rightly be eternal vigilance in all these areas.

When we look at sport today, and particularly boxing, we see strong arguments why the 1980s should go down in the annals of professional boxing as a glorious decade for the sport. Yet the likelihood grows, year by year, that this decade may mark the end of professional boxing. It is deeply to be regretted that I come before the House concerned that the future of the sport is threatened—threatened primarily not from the medical lobby, from pressure groups or from lack of public interest but from within the sport itself.

I should state from the outset that I retain an unpaid interest in boxing. Along with my hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), I was honoured to represent Oxford university in the varsity match. An unexpected com/box swap with Charlie Magri at the helm of the Oxford VIII brought me into contact with Terry Lawless for whom I have the highest respect, and, I might add, into physical contact with Paddy McGuire in the ring, sparring against the former British bantamweight champion, down interest in tabling amendments in Committee I am glad to withdraw in the light of his assurances. I want to ensure that the Bill reaches the statute book at the earliest possible moment. Any day that is saved in that process will significantly save jobs and the basis of British industry.

Mr. Butcher: No doubt the whole House will note my hon. Friend's comments. I should also correct the record and credit him with the very perceptive question that I answered earlier. He also raised the Australian issue and the international massaging of programmes for re-export.

Copyright protection covers not just authorised reproduction of a complete work, but the copying of a substantial part of the work. Thus, if a computer programme is copied in the manner suggested by my hon. Friend sufficient of the original programme is likely to be contained in the copy for it to be an unauthorised copy under copyright law. The copyright law cannot be avoided by making small and insignificant changes to a copyright work, even if the work is imported and the changes were made overseas. This will apply to computer programmes as much as to any other work.

On behalf of the Government, therefore, I welcome the Bill. It is particularly welcome in view of the importance we attach to encouraging the software industry in the United Kingdom. The Bill will provide the protection needed by the creators of original computer programmes to ensure continued development and expansion of this successful sector of the information technology industry.

A number of hon. Members have reminded us that there is growing concern about the scale of software piracy both in business software and in computer games. When I talk about piracy, I am thinking of those people who make unauthorised copies of computer programmes and then sell them, thereby threatening the livelihood of legitimate producers and dealers. The success of any industry is underpinned by protection from unfair competition and the software industry is no exception.

It is difficult to be sure about the exact scale of software piracy, but it is clear that a significant problem exists. I also believe that piracy could pose a real threat to the software industry if not acted against now. The amendments to copyright law contained in the Bill will go a long way towards helping the software industry to combat this growing threat. The Government are therefore glad of an opportunity to support the measures in the Bill and thus to prevent piracy getting out of hand.

A number of hon. Members referred to the relationship between the Bill and the broader implications of copyright law and future attempts to bring together some of the pressing copyright issues currently outstanding. Copyright law essentially provides an author with protection against unauthorised copying of his work. To attract copyright protection, the work must be original. Another important feature of copyright law is that registration of a claim to copyright is not required. The protection commences automatically as soon as the original work has been created. It does not depend on publication or any other form of public exposure of the work. Various categories of work can attract copyright protection—for example, literary works, artistic works, films and sound recordings.

The protection provided by copyright law is given by the Copyright Act 1956, which gives original literary works protection against unauthorised copying and various other acts such as publication and adaptation. Protection is also given against trading — for example, selling, importing or exhibiting copies of a work known by the trader to be infringing copies. It is established that the term "literary work" includes such mundane items as street directories and railway timetables.

In the enforcement of copyright, both the civil and criminal arms of the law can be brought into play. The civil remedies are available to a copyright owner suing someone whom he detects to be infringing his copyright. They include injunctions, which can often be used very effectively to stop unauthorised copying of a work subject to copyright. There is also the possibility of damages, which the courts will award after taking into account the seriousness of the unauthorised copying. It is clear that the damages awarded could be extremely high if a copyright owner has suffered seriously at the hands of a person involved in large scale piracy of his work. The civil remedies can therefore be used very effectively by many copyright owners to deal with the majority of cases of copyright infringement.

I should stress that the Government believe that copyright should in general be enforced by the use of the civil remedies as I have just described. The criminal remedies are important, but they can only be viewed as a last resort. The civil remedies are, in any case, more comprehensive since they can be used against any unauthorised copying, not just where the copying is done for commercial purposes. The criminal remedies, on the other hand, are available only against a person who makes infringing copies for sale or hire or who trades in infringing copies.

It is, however, right that the criminal remedies should be used in cases where the seriousness of the offence justifies this approach. However, other than for offences involving copyright films and sound recordings, it is true to say that at the moment the criminal remedies under copyright law are very seldom used.

In 1981, the Government published a Green Paper entitled "Reform of the Law Relating to Copyright and Performers' Protection", Cmnd. 8302. There we indicated the intention to strengthen the criminal measures under copyright law. In particular, an increase in the scale of penalities to deterrent levels was proposed. In due course, we intend to introduce increased penalties for all categories of copyright material in a comprehensive copyright Bill.

I come to the detailed provisions of the Bill. I shall consider its two distinct aspects separately. First, there is the intention to make clear provision for the protection of computer programmes by copyright. Although it is widely believed that copyright protection under existing law already extends to computer programmes, there is some doubt about the matter. It was precisely that area of doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Corby illustrated so vividly and successfully in reinforcing his argument for the Bill. After all, computers were in a very early stage of development when the Copyright Act 1956 was drafted, so it is hardly surprising that copyright law does not specifically mention how computer programmes are to be treated. The courts have not resolved the matter, so some doubt remains.

Under the Copyright Act 1956, making an unauthorised adaptation of a literary work is an infringement of the copyright in the work. The Bill, by giving computer programmes the same copyright protection as is currently enjoyed by literary works, therefore presents an opportunity of clearing up a few crucial definitions.

The second aspect of the Bill concerns penalties and enforcement — matters that are obviously of great importance to the software industry. Naturally enough, the industry has seen the dramatic effect of recent changes to copyright law in reducing video piracy, and now seeks similar changes to deal with the piracy of computer programmes. Indeed, one or two commentators feel that those who exploited the video piracy market but who now find it difficult to do so, may be the same people who see similar opportunities in this market. Perhaps we need to protect this industry from those self-same individuals who wish to make another killing. So the Government support these changes to deal with piracy in this new area before it becomes an even more serious problem.

As I have said, the current level of criminal penalties under copyright law is generally low. All offences are triable only summarily and the maximum fine is £400 with the option of up to two months imprisonment. The Bill will have the effect that the more serious offences of making for sale or hire, importing by way of trade or distributing infringing copies of computer programmes knowing them to be such will become triable either way. On conviction on indictment, an unlimited fine and/or up to two years imprisonment will apply. Less serious trading offences, such as selling, hiring, exhibiting or possessing infringing copies of computer programmes knowing them to be such, will remain triable only summarily with a maximum fine of £2,000 and/or two months imprisonment.

The Bill will also give the police the power to enter premises in order to search for and seize evidence of a copyright offence involving computer programmes, upon the issue by a magistrate of a warrant to do so. A warrant may be issued only if the police satisfy the magistrate that there are reasonable grounds for believing that one of the more serious offences has been or is about to be committed. He must also be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that there is evidence on the premises that the offence has been or is about to be committed. Thus, the police powers to deal with piracy of computer programmes will be introduced with the same important safeguards that already apply to video and record copyright offences.

The Bill will give the police powers of entry, search and seizure. I must add a reservation about these additional powers. It must be for individual chief police officers to determine the priority that they can assign to these powers, and they can normally be expected to allow police involvement only where there is some evidence of a link with serious, large-scale or organised crime. As with video piracy, it is essential that the trade should undertake the bulk of enforcement work. I know that this has been accepted by the industry, mainly through the Federation Against Software Theft. I am glad that its commitment to fighting piracy of computer programmes will complement the important provisions in my hon. Friend's Bill.

I stress that the Government see the Bill only as an interim measure to deal with the immediate problem of uncertainty as to the copyright protection available to computer programmes, and to halt the growth of software piracy. Wider reforms are needed in copyright law which must await the introduction of a comprehensive Bill. Nevertheless, the Government welcome and support the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby. We congratulate him, and we give the Bill our wholehearted support. My hon. Friend will be able to guide the House on how he wishes to proceed today, in the light of the many comments that have been made.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): This is the first occasion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have caught your eye since your knighthood. That honour gave pleasure to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I warmly welcome the Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). Cambridge is the father of the computer industry. The area's prosperity is based upon high technology. The Bill is overdue and welcome.

I declare an interest as an author. I enter one caveat. When we consider legislation we must remember that copyright is of value only if it has international strength. The international copyright convention is more important than a change in our own law. The current copyright law victimises certain scholars who wish to make quotations because they have to go through such a long process. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will consider those two crucial points.

When I was elected in December 1976 to represent Cambridge, the Cambridge science park consisted of one building, and fewer than 40 people were employed there. The park now comprises 40 companies employing 1,400 people. That is as good an example as any of the crucial link between research, science, industry, jobs and prosperity. An important element in that prosperity has been built in Cambridge, as elsewhere, on the remarkable development in computers.

Until my hon. Friend the Member for Corby introduced the Bill, there had been no real protection for the brains, initiative and research lying behind the software industry. Although my hon. Friends will have to address themselves to the Bill's international application, the Bill is welcome to me, to my constituents and, in many ways, is overdue.

I was glad that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary responded to the important point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall). My reservations about the Bill are not a criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby or his Bill—they represent the fact that we are dealing with a rather larger subject than can be dealt with briefly in a short Bill.

Mr. Lyell: My hon. Friend has made the excellent point that some of the anomalies in our existing copyright law are impinging upon scholars and those involved in the work of highest scholarship. Is he aware that as a result of changes through the courts, copyright protection is now given even to the drawing of a washer—and an old-fashioned washer at that?

Mr. Rhodes James: I am constantly amazed at the wisdom and the variety of standing of my colleagues. I was not aware that an ancient washer is covered by copyright, so I shall now leave the House a wiser person.

I warmly welcome the Bill, with the reservations that I have expressed and which go beyond the Bill. I hope that the Government will give it all assistance on to the statute book.

12.46 pm

Mr. William Powell: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, I shall reply to the debate. During the hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) on the matter of professional boxing, which has been a source of much disquiet outside the House.

This is a subject on which both hon. Members are well qualified to speak. Both have personal experience of the sport, and it will bring a feeling of warmth and a glow to your heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to realise that they were both dark blues, obviously at varying weights. My hon. Friend is a competitor and steward of the British Boxing Board of Control, and he has wider experience as a member both of the Sports Council and the 1984 British Olympic team.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has played a consistent part in these matters in the House for a number of years, and I am grateful for his contribution. He will understand that there are many points in the debate to which I cannot respond in view of the litigation which is occurring elsewhere.

Professional boxing has established a proud tradition in this country in the last 60 years or so, largely through the commendable efforts of the sport's governing body, the BBBC, the format of which has been followed in other countries.

The BBBC was first formed in 1918. As part of my preparation for the debate, I read the excellent BBBC jubilee document which was published in 1979 and was fascinated to read about how the board began. History is all-important in this, as in other spheres. An article by Gilbert Odd, the former editor of Boxing News, began:

"Answering a correspondent in its issue dated September 9th 1911, 'Boxing' stated, 'A licence is not required for a boxing hall, but you should apply for police protection.'"

Clearly, the sport felt that it should be well-regulated. I am happy to note that my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell, (Mr. Hamilton), is doing duty on the Government Front Bench this afternoon. One of his forebears, a great uncle, Lord Hamilton of Dalzell, was one of the founding members of the BBBC.

This is an important debate and it is interesting to note exactly how the board was formed in 1929. It was born out of the old National Sporting Club, founded in 1891, and in March 1929 the BBBC's first constitution and regulations were issued. The first president of the BBBC was Lord Lonsdale, whose name lives on.

Before the BBBC came into being, managers and trainers were self-appointed with little or no qualifications, and the same applied to referees. Concern for the physical welfare of boxers was negligible and the attendance of a doctor at the ringside was very rare indeed. Since the board's inception, it has led the way in the introduction of measures to protect boxers, and has highly qualified members of the medical profession within its ranks. I endorse what has been said about its chief medical adviser. It has also played a significant role in the production of the stringent medical requirements that all professional boxers must meet before they are allowed to compete. In addition, the BBBC is recognised by many countries as a fine example of how a sport should be regulated, controlled and administered.

Just as the future development of professional boxing under the auspices of the BBBC relies on the amateur side of the sport—most professionals have had an amateur career—so the reverse is true. Professional boxing provides the incentive for amateurs. The amateur side of the sport is controlled by the Amateur Boxing Association in England, to which the Schools Amateur Boxing Association is affiliated.

There has been a marked increase in interest in amateur boxing in recent years. There are about 870 clubs with 45,000 registered members. Many of the youngsters who join boxing clubs come from deprived areas and inner cities and encounter at their clubs, sometimes for the first time, firm but fair discipline. They are encouraged to develop their physical fitness and mental awareness and they learn self-control and develop team spirit that they may have lacked before. The club gives them a positive interest and goals to aim for.

In recognition of the important role that amateur boxing has to play in the community and in encouraging youngsters to channel their energies into a demanding sport, the Sports Council assisted local clubs with £47,500 in capital grants and loans in 1983-84. In addition, the ABA received over £82,000 in current grant in that year and the schools body received about £3,500.

Between them, the BBBC and the ABA have been responsible not only for much of the development of the sport, but for producing world champions and Olympic medallists who have become household names and passed into folklore. The popularity of the sport is evidenced by the large crowds which flock to important bouts and by the press coverage that the sport receives, which is an important dimension.

Lately, some of those press reports have not been as encouraging as they might have been for the sport. There has been concern about the health dangers of boxing and reports of a cartel operating at the highest level within the sport. Those matters are primarily for the governing body—the BBBC. As one would expect, the board has responded responsibly.

The House would not expect me to comment in detail on the allegation of a cartel. I have read the newspapers and absorbed the articles. I note that the BBBC is to investigate the allegation and take whatever action is required. That open-minded approach can only be for the good of the sport, and the comments made in the debate will be widely read and absorbed.

I recognise clearly the legitimate concerns of some members of the medical profession about some of the risks associated with boxing—I discussed those concerns when I last met the BBBC formally—and the board of control also takes those concerns seriously. As I said, the board has led the way in the introduction of measures to protect boxers.

However, the risk of injury cannot be eliminated in any contest, as hon. Members have said, and it is important to recognise that those who take up boxing and many other sports do so in full knowledge of the injuries that they might sustain. Recent publicity about the health risks of boxing will have ensured that that is even more true. However, while those who take up boxing do so in that knowledge, and as a result of their interest in the sport, it is right that they should be subjected to the most rigorous medical requirements and that those should be controlled by their own governing body.

Like any sport or any other public activity, boxing will have its problems and difficulties with which it must cope. However, I am sure that, with continued responsible and clear leadership from its governing body, it will have a bright future. The ability of the sport to attract talent and spectators is not in doubt and I am sure that the BBBC will continue to live up to its long and honourable traditions. The Government see that as a right and proper role for the BBBC. It is a fundamental principle of British sport that individual sports are controlled by the governing bodies that are responsible to their own members. The state does not run sport in Britain.

Those who call for legislation to ban professional boxing should remember that legislation of the type sometimes advocated would no more mean an end to people fighting with their fists for money than prohibition meant an end to people drinking in Chicago and elsewhere in America in the 1920s and 1930s. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East said in his excellent speech, it would signal the end to the control exercised by the governing body, which has been a model, and the rigorous code that it currently enforces. We would step backwards into time to the back-street or fairground booth style of boxing, which the current rules are designed to prevent.

This has been a constructive debate. I hope that the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East and of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde will be widely absorbed outside the House. Those of us who have an interest in and direct responsibility for the orderliness of a major sport in this country want to see question marks eliminated as quickly as possible. I commend the debate to the House and for wider reading. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for initiating, and to the hon. Gentleman for participating in, a debate on such an important subject. I shall consider many of the important issues which have been raised and write to my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

ENERGY

Electricity and Gas

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the percentage rise in the price of (a) electricity and (b) gas since 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: The price indices for domestic gas and electricity are both components of the general index of retail prices. Between 1979 and 1984 the index for gas rose by 112·5 and that for electricity by 76·5 per cent. However, between April 1983 and December 1984, the index for gas rose by only 4·2 per cent. and that for electricity by 2·1 per cent., in both cases a fall in real terms.

Severn Barrage

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress of the Severn barrage project.

Mr. David Hunt: In answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on 12 May 1983 at column 379 the then Secretary of State for Energy announced that the Government and the Severn Tidal Power Group would jointly fund an assessment of the technical and financial viability of a private sector Severn barrage. Work is proceeding on this assessment.

The Department has also been approached by the Wimpey-Atkins Group seeking support for a similar study for a smaller barrage at the English Stones Site near the Severn bridge. I hope to make an announcement on this shortly.

My Department has also recently funded some background studies on tidal energy.

Culham Laboratory

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Energy what reductions in expenditure have occurred in Her Majesty's Government-funded research at Culham laboratory since the financial year 1979-80; and what further reductions are required; and if he will make a statement as to the projects affected.

Mr. Goodlad: Culham laboratory carries out the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's programme of fusion research under a contract of association with Euratom, which contributes to its funding. This research constitutes the major component of the laboratory's activities.

Government expenditure on fusion programme through the nuclear vote has been:

1979-80	10·5
1980-81	11·4
1981-82	17·3
1982-83	12·5
1983-84	14·1
1984-85	*14·3

* Estimated.

I reported the decisions which had been made on the Government's funding of this programme for the years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) on 10 January.

Because, within the agreed Euratom budget ceiling for fusion research, the allocation of funds to contract of association work at Culham and elsewhere has not been determined, the UKAEA has not yet finalised the details of its fusion programme for those years. It intends, however, that work in support of the Joint European Torus (JET) project and related areas will continue to be given priority.

The laboratory has also carried out a small amount of research in areas other that fusion which will continue.

Coal Industry (Apprenticeships)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many apprenticeships were available in the coal mining industry in 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. David Hunt: This is a matter for the National Coal Board.

Electricity Boards (Pricing Policy)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list his powers in relation to electricity boards' policy making with particular respect to pricing policy and private and commercial consumer tariffs.

Mr. Goodlad: I have no statutory powers over electricity prices. Electricity boards set their own tariffs in accordance with statutory provisions and taking into account the financial framework within which they operate.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Sector Employment (Costs)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister if she will give the latest figures available for the total annual cost and the average annual cost of full-time equivalent posts in (a) the National Health Service, (b) the Civil Service, (c) local government and (d) all remaining public sector work forces, including nationalised industries; and if she will break down the average cost for a full-time equivalent post into pay, national insurance, superannuation and other costs, respectively.

The Prime Minister: The latest available figures of wages and salaries relate to the calendar year and are published in table 1.14 and 9.4 of the annual Blue Book "United Kingdom National Accounts". The corresponding full-time equivalent employment estimates were published in the annual Economic Trends article on employment in the public and private sector (March 1984 issue). Per capita averages calculated in this way have little meaning, because of the wide variety of different types of staff employed in each sector, but, for what they are worth, they are as follows:

	1983 Total income from employment £ million	Mid-1983 Total full-time equivalent thousands	Cost per f.t.e. £
National Health Service	*8,616	1,045	8,250
Other central Government civilians*	*7,566	769	9,840
Her Majestys Forces	4,022	322	12,490
Local government	21,199	2,278	9,310
Public corporations	17,755	1,641	10,820

* The allocation between the NHS and other central government has been revised since publication of the Blue Book.

"Other central Government" comprises the Civil Services of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and various non-departmental bodies.

"Income from employment" is defined as for the national accounts. It covers pay and employers contributions to national insurance and superannuation but not the national insurance surcharge. It does not include other staff related costs such as training or accommodation costs.

The breakdown of the figures requested is not generally available, but some information on the central government sector is published in table 2 of the memorandum to the Supply Estimates by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. The coverage of the information therein is slightly different to that of the figures quoted above.

Milk

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the Government now propose to veto the proposed increase in the price of milk.

The Prime Minister: The Government are studying the Commission's agricultural price proposals for 1985-86 and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be making the Government's view known in due course.

Payments to Farmers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the payments made from the Exchequer to farmers and their purpose.

The Prime Minister: Details of payments currently paid to farmers, and their purpose, by the Agricultural Departments and the Intervention Board for Agricultural produce are set out in the Supply Estimates for 1984-85 (class III votes 1, 3 and 4, class XV votes 1 and 2 and class XVI votes 2 and 5). A summary of public expenditure under the CAP and on national grants and subsidies over the last 5 years is given in table 28 of the Annual Review of Agriculture 1985 (Cmnd. 9423), published on 15 January.

Northern Ireland (Security)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Prime Minister if she will list those aspects of internal security in Northern Ireland which fall outside the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland; which Minister is responsible in each case; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Security policy in Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who will undertake any necessary consultations within government, notably with the Secretary of State for Defence in relation to the support of the Armed Forces for the civil power. The Attorney-General and the Lord Chancellor are responsible respectively for the prosecution of offences and for the court service in Northern Ireland.

Guatemala

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what representations she has made to the United States of America concerning the resumption of military aid to Guatemala.

The Prime Minister: The United States Government are well aware of our concern about the possible consequences of military aid to Guatemala for the British garrison in Belize. We continue to keep in close touch with them about this.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the Government's policy regarding civil aid to Guatemala.

The Prime Minister: The Government have no bilateral aid programme for Guatemala.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the Government's policy regarding military aid to Guatemala.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom gives no military aid to Guatemala and has no intention of doing so.

Belize

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if the Government's military and financial commitment in Belize is to increase following the proposed resumption in United States military aid to Guatemala; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We see no need to alter our present military and financial commitment to Belize.

Wintex—Cimex '85 Exercise

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister whether the armed forces headquarters, Brecon, will be involved in Wintex '85.

The Prime Minister: All major Service headquarters, including Army Headquarters Wales at Brecon, will be involved in Exercise WINTEX—CIMEX '85.

Security Vetting (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Prime Minister if she has transferred to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry responsibility for the operation of the Royal Ulster Constabulary Special Branch in relation to security vetting of British Telecom employees in Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 8 February 1985, c. 702]: No. Responsibility for the operation of all branches of the Royal Ulster Constabulary rests with the Chief Constable and it is for British Telecom to ensure that all necessary security checks in relation to its employees are carried out.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the cost of administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Sir Keith Joseph: The total cost of administration of the Department, including Her Majesty's Inspectorate expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was:

	£ million
1979-80	46·889
1980-81	49·977
1981-82	49·334
1982-83	49·651
1983-84	51·604

The figures for all years include the Office of Arts and Libraries which became an independent Department on 1 July 1983 and whose running costs are included in the DES totals in the annual scrutinies of Departmental running costs (from which the information is derived) up to and including 1983-84.

Education and Training Board

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to reply to the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology concerning the proposed education and training board; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: This and other recommendations in the report will require careful consideration. The Government's response will be announced as soon as this process has been completed.

Teaching Shortages

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to respond to the advice on teaching shortages in schools from the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has not received any advice from the University Grants Committee or the National Advisory Body on teaching shortages in schools.

Physics Teaching

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department about the number of schools which have been asked to stop teaching physics from 1985 onwards.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has no information that any school has been asked to stop teaching physics from 1985 onwards. Ministers have on a number of occasions made clear their view that all pupils, including all girls, should be properly introduced to science in the primary school and should continue to study a broad programme of science education throughout the first five years of secondary schooling.

School Closures

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools have been closed since 1979; and how many staff teaching posts have been affected as a result.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. The net reduction in the number maintained primary, middle and secondary schools in England between January 1979 and January 1984 was 1,539. Information about staff teaching posts affected by closures of schools is not collected centrally.

Universities (Recurrent Costs)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to what degree he intends to instruct universities to reduce their recurrent costs per student during the next two years.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's Expenditure Plans (Cmnd. 9428) assume that the universities will continue to improve their efficiency, but my right hon. Friend has not set specific targets for costs per student.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the recurrence grant to the universties for each year since 1978-79 in constant 1984-85 prices and in cash terms, excluding the element of the grant paid since 1982-83 to compensate for the loss of fee income from the reduction in tuition fees for home students in that year.

Sir Keith Joseph: Recurent grant made available to universities in Great Britain on the advice of the University Grants Committee in each financial year since 1978-79, excluding elements to compensate for the loss of fee income from the reduction of the home undergraduate tuition fee in 1982-83 and its freezing in 1983-84, was as follows. (The real terms figures are the cash terms figures adjusted to a 1983-84 base, using GDP deflators which provide an estimate of the average movment of prices across the economy as a whole. A deflator for 1984-85 is not yet available.)

Financial year	Cash terms £	Real terms £
1978-79	602,005,233	1,022,323,189
1979-80	728,481,734	1,058,209,111
1980-81	942,931,714	1,154,845,945
1981-82	967,959,423	1,077,905,816
1982-83	1,006,705,242	1,051,147,770

Financial year	Cash terms £	Real terms £
1983-84	1,061,199,999	1,061,199,999
1984-85 (Estimates provision)	1,124,664,000	1,073,664,916

Provision specificallay for redundancy and restructuring, amounting to £57,000,000 in 1982-83 and £38,000,000 in 1983-84 is not included in the above.

A and O-level Passes

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list local education authorities in England in order of achievement according to (a) the percentage of school leavers obtaining two or more A-level passes and separately (b) the percentage of school leavers obtaining five or more O-level passes.

Mr. Dunn: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Comprehensive and Selective Systems

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all local education authorities in England, indicating in each case whether (a) a fully comprehensive system operates, (b) a fully selective system operates or (c) whether some combination of selective and comprehensive system operates.

Mr. Dunn: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

VAT (Books)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost to students, libraries and educational institutions if value added tax were to be imposed on books at the current rate and at 5 per cent.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have been asked to reply.

There is nothing I can usefully add to the replies which the hon. Member has already received on this subject from the Secretary of State for Education and Science on 25 and 31 October at columns 661 and 1001-103 respectively from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of the Environment on 25 October at column 209 and from myself on 31 October at column 1068.

SCOTLAND

AIDS

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received asking him to take early steps to make acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease in Scotland.

Mr. John McKay: None.

Buses

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing the total amount paid to bus operators in respect of revenue support for the financial year 1974-75 and 1984-85, together with the total bus route mileage and passengers carried for each of the years in respect of each of the regional and island councils in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Details of bus route mileage are not readily available on a regional of islands area basis. Regional and islands councils were not established until May 1975. A comparison of revenue support for buses by area is not therefore available for 1974-75. However, for Scotland as a whole such recenue expenditure in 1974-75 was £3·9 million and in 1983-84 (the latest year for which figures are available) £23·1 million.

Private Health Insurance

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has authorised the display and availability of British United Provident Association or other private health insurance material in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: No. That is a matter for the health boards.

Draft Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why he withdrew the draft Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984; and whether any further draft order on this specific subject matter which he may lay before Parliament will be identical to the 1984 order.

Mr. John MacKay: The draft Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984 attracted criticism on a number of counts and there was an apparent irregularity in the laying procedure. My right hon. Friend expects to lay a new draft order before Parliament shortly. This will not be identical and will take account of representations made and certain drafting amendments.

Salmon and Sea Trout

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the decline in salmon and sea trout stocks in Scottish rivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Representations are received from time to time from organisations and individuals who are concerned about the state of salmon stocks. Data on catches for 1984 are not available. The Scottish catch of salmon in 1983, by all methods, was higher than in any of the four previous years though well below the levels attained in the 1960s and early 1970s.

Roads (Safety Barriers)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications by regional councils for the installations of safety barriers on trunk roads have been refused in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

1981	0
1982	0

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria must be satisfied before safety barriers are installed on trunk roads in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Safety fences are normally recommended only on major roads where speed restrictions permit 80 km/h (50 mph) or above and for which the circumstances below apply; there will also be a need for safety fences on less important roads where there may be exceptional hazards either affecting the layout or the roadside.

A. VERGES

(a) On embankments 6·0m or more in height.

(b) On embankments where there is a road, railway, river or abnormal hazard at the foot of the slope.

(c) On the outside only of curves less than about 850m radius on embankments between 3·0m and 6·0m in height.

(d) At obstructions such as bridge piers, or abutments, or posts to large signs.

B. CENTRAL RESERVES

(a) For protection at bridge piers, posts to large signs, etc, which, if displaced would cause danger to other vehicles or persons.

(b) For protection at lighting columns.

(c) On urban roads without central lighting columns where the central reserve is not more than 1·75m wide and enables adequate clearance to be provided between the face of the safety fence and the edge of the carriageway.

(d) On rural roads where the central reserve width is 2·5m or less.

(e) On roads where the difference in carraigeway levels exceeds 1·0m and the slope across the reserve is steeper than 25 per cent.

(f) On such heavily trafficked rural motorways as may be agreed by the Scottish Development Department.

(g) Exceptionally and subject to special justification on all-purpose dual carriageways on which speeds of 100 kph (60 mph) or above are permitted and which have central reserves between 2·5m and 6·0m wide.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what lengths of safety barriers have been replaced on motorways and on other trunk roads in Scotland each year for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: Replacement of safety barriers is one of several categories of trunk road maintenance work which comprise a single item in the annual expenditure accounts submitted to the Scottish Development Department by regional councils, as agent authorities. It cannot therefore be identified separately.

Corporal Punishment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has had from Scottish local education authorities in reply to the request he submitted to them to abolish corporal punishment in schools.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I understand that of the 12 education authorities in Scotland six have completed the process of abolition and a seventh expects to do so by the end of this school session. Of the remainder, three authorities have abolished corporal punishment in all but secondary schools, one authority has decided to retain corporal punishment in all its schools and one authority has yet to reach a decision on this matter.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

In Camera Proceedings

Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General if he will list the cases, both civil and criminal, in the last 12 months in which he has applied for all or part of the hearing to be held in camera, giving the nature of each such case and the grounds for each application.

The Attorney-General: Since 1 February 1984 such applications have been made by the Director of Public Prosecutions in two cases, both of which involved offences under the Official Secrets Act 1911. No statistics are available for the number of cases in which the court has exercised its power under section 37 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 to exclude members of the public whilst taking evidence from a child or young person. No applications of the nature specified in the question have been made in civil proceedings.

Gipsies (Hampstead Heath)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Attorney-General if he will bring proceedings to secure the observance by the Greater London council of its legal obligations in respect of the prevention of nuisance arising from gipsy encampments on Hampstead heath.

The Attorney-General: If the hon. Member will write to me with the details of the case I shall consider them.

Small Claims

Dr. Godman asked the Attorney-General if it is Her Majesty's Government's intention in the near future to raise the financial limit for small claims procedure in the county courts.

The Attorney-General: Not at present.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Building

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department where the 16 new prisons which the Government plans to build will be located.

Mr. Mellor: The locations of the new establishments in the current programme are as follows:

Wayland—In the village of Griston, north of Thetford, Norfolk.

Thorn Cross—In the village of Appleton Thorn, Cheshire.

Stocken—Near Oakham, Leicestershire.

Full Sutton—Adjacent to the village of Full Sutton, near Stamford Bridge, Humberside.

Mount—On the former airfield at Bovingdon, Hertfordshire.

Garth — Adjacent to Wymott prison, Ulnes Walton, near Leyland, Lancashire.

Gaynes Hall—On the site of the former youth custody centre, adjacent to the village of Perry, near Great Staughton, Cambridgeshire.

Swaleside—Adjacent to Standford Hill prison, at Eastchurch on the Isle of Sheppey, Kent.

Featherstone II—Adjacent to the existing Featherstone prison north of Wolverhampton, Staffordshire.

Milton Keynes——Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire.

Bicester—Near the village of Arncott, Oxfordshire.

March—In March, Cambridgeshire.

Lancaster Farms—In Lancaster, Lancashire.

Woolwich—On the royal arsenal site at Woolwich, Greater London.

Ashford—On the site of the existing remand centre at Ashford, Middlesex.

North of England—On a site yet to be determined.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any evidence that would suggest why a majority of those who committed suicide in penal establishments in 1984 were unsentenced prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: No. The Chief Inspector of Prisons' recent report on suicides in prison recommended that research should be mounted into the circumstances and characteristics of prisoners who kill themselves, and this is under consideration.

Royal Prerogative of Mercy

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in 1984 the royal prerogative of mercy was used to effect the early release of prisoners; and, in each case, what was the age, sex, offence, sentence, length of sentence uncompleted and the nature of the illness.

Mr. Mellor: In 1984 the royal prerogative of mercy was used to effect the release of three men because of illness. One 26-year-old man, serving a total sentence of 18 months' imprisonment for assault occasioning actual bodily harm, breach of an order of conditional discharge and breach of suspended sentences, was released with three months of his sentence to serve because he was suffering from cancer. (I regret that, in the reply given to a question from the hon. Member on 9 July 1984 at column 359, the length of sentence uncompleted in this case was wrongly stated as two months.

A 67-year-old man serving a sentence of seven years' imprisonment for illegal importation of drugs was released with 16 months of his sentence to serve because he was suffering from cancer. A 20-year-old man who was serving a total sentence of nine months' youth custody for burglary, behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace and assault occasioning actual bodily harm was released with three months of his sentence to serve because he was suffering from acute myeloid leukaemia.

Probation Service (North Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the policy of his Department in regard to the provision of a probation service in north Wales which reflects the linguistic character of the area.

Mr. Mellor: When it falls to my right hon. and learned Friend to make any decision affecting the North Wales probation service, the factor which the hon. Member mentions is one of several that he takes into account in so far as they may be relevant. The primary consideration must be the overall effect of the decision on the service's ability to discharge its duties satisfactorily.

Extradition (Spain)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has made for new extradition arrangements between the United Kingdom and Spain.

Mr. Mellor: Discussions with the Spanish authorities are still continuing and useful progress has been made. At this stage, however, we feel it would be premature to go into the detail of particular proposals.

Mr. and Mrs. Mahmoud

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now reply to the letter sent to him on 14 January by the hon. Member for Gower regarding his constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Mahmoud, of 5 Hall Lane, Penssard, Swansea.

Mr. Waddington: I have written to the hon. Member today.

M25 (Accident)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has yet received reports on the M25 accident from the chief constables of Kent and Surrey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has received reports from the Chief Constables of Surrey and Kent on the accident which took place on the M25 motorway on 11 December 1984. These confirm that the accident resulted from a combination of excess speed by some drivers and freak weather conditions. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Transport and I recently discussed this accident and the arrangements for policing the M25 motorway with the chief constables concerned.

Prevention of Terrorism (Amendments)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many other persons carrying Syrian passports accompanied the four men travelling on Syrian passports who were deported on or around 29 January; whether they were all given leave to enter the United Kingdom; for how long in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I am not aware of any other persons carrying Syrian passports who accompanied the four men from Damascus. The men who were in possession of valid visas, were each given leave to enter the United Kingdom for six months, having satisfied the immigration officer at the time of examination that they met the requirements of the immigration rules.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the interests of security and avoidance of terrorist incidences, he will require the closure of the premises in London purporting to represent the Palestine Liberation Organisation; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. Any organisation may maintain an office in this country provided that the activities of that office, and its occupants, remain within the law. If there were any suggestion that the law had been broken or that there was a threat to security the police would, of course, take appropriate action.

Fire Service Regulations

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to modify the Fire Service (Appointments and Promotions) Regulations 1978 to reflect continuing changes in fire-fighting techniques and the increasing recruitment of women firefighters.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend is required by section 18 of the Fire Service Act 1947 (as amended) to consult the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council before making any changes in these regulations. The council agreed at its last meeting to a proposal by the Home Departments to establish a working party jointly with the Scottish Council to review, inter alia, those aspects of the regulations which govern the physical requirements for appointment as a whole time firefighter, both men and women.

The working party will consist of representatives of fire authorities, fire service representative bodies and officials of the Home Departments together with medical advisers.

Voluntary After-care Scheme

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be able to report the results of his review of the voluntary after-care scheme which provides accommodation for ex-prisoners, referred to in his answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 55.

Mr. Mellor: We expect the present fact-finding stage of the review to be completed this spring, and my right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be able to report his conclusions to the House as soon as practicable thereafter.

Fire Service (Funding)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the fire service in England and Wales are funded under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. Waddington: Six fire service posts are funded under section 11, five in the west midlands and one in Kent.

Police Service (Funding)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the police service in England and Wales are funded under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. Waddington: Police officers are not local authority employees. It follows that posts in the police service are not eligible for funding under section 11.

Wintex-Cimex '85 Exercise

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Northumbria and Durham police forces will be involved in the Wintex-Cimex '85 exercises; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police participation is a matter for each chief constable but I understand from the Chief Constable that Northumbria police will be involved; but the Chief Constable of Durham constabulary has yet to reach a decision.

Hospitals (Assaults on Staff)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases criminal proceedings have arisen in 1984 resulting from assaults on staff in hospital premises.

Mr. Mellor: Except for assaults on police officers the information collected centrally on court proceedings does not include details of the circumstances of the assault.

Ex-Pc I. M. McQuarrie (Criminal Injuries Claim)

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will investigate the cause of the delays by the Criminal Injuries Compensation board in finalising the claim for criminal injuries by ex-Pc I. M. McQuarrie, whose claim has been with the board since March 1982.

Mr. Mellor: Yes. I will write to the hon. Member.

Overseas Visitors and Immigrants

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to ensure that all immigrants and visitors arriving at United Kingdom airports and other points of entry are always treated with courtesy at all times.

Mr. Waddington: This is already the policy. Immigration officers are required to maintain a correct and courteous relationship with the public and to ensure that their behaviour gives no cause for complaint.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to organise a civilian equivalent of the military exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Not at present.

Lowdham Grange Youth Custody Centre

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inmates of Lowdham Grange youth custody centre were given leave to attend funerals of friends or relatives in January.

Mr. Mellor: Two.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to the answer of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, his hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) of 31 January, Official Report, column 255, whether the register of applications to the board of visitors at Winson Green prison was checked for any reference to his noble Friend, Lord Elton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Nitroglycerine (Greiss Test)

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Greiss test is still in use by his Department's laboratories for the detection of nitroglycerine.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes.

Prevention of Terrorism (Arrest)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether four men travelling on Syrian passports who were arrested and questioned by the Metropolitan police under the Prevention of Terrorism Act were suspected of conspiring to cause an explosion or of any other terrorist act;

(2) for how long the four men travelling on Syrian passports arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism Act and deported around 29 January were held by the Metropolitan police; and on what date they were arrested;

(3) why four men travelling on Syrian passports who were arrested and questioned by the Metropolitan police on or about 20 January were not charged with any offence.

Mr. Brittan: There is nothing I can add to the reply I gave to a question from the right hon. Member on 7 February at column 656.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give the names, ages and purported occupations of the four Syrian nationals who were arrested on 20 January, detained until 27 January and deported on 29 January; and which of the four men was in possession of a Syrian diplomatic passport.

Mr. Brittan: The names and ages recored in the men's passports were: Mohammed Ali Abdullah, 34, Ahmed Hussein Al-Bitam, 31; Marwan Lostan, 49; and Morris Youssef Saba, 40. Only Mr. Lostan's passport recorded his occupation—that of engineer—and it was he who was carrying a diplomatic passport.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC (Imports and Exports)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the United Kingdom share of imports of manufactures by the EEC Six, the present European Free Trade Association countries plus Denmark, and the Irish Republic for each year from 1962 together with his estimate for 1984.

Mr. Channon: The information is in the table. Estimates for 1984 could only be produced at disproportionate cost.

British Standards Institution (Exhibition)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the British Standards Institution to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Butcher: Yes. Arrangements have been made for such an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall to take place from Monday 25 February to Friday 1 March 1985.

Certification Marks

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he intends to replace the current variety of certification marks with one national promotable mark.

Mr. Butcher: The Government have no current plans to introduce a single national mark to replace the marks of individual certification bodies.

Accredited Certification Bodies

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he is giving to the creation of an additional mark for accredited certification bodies.

Mr. Butcher: The Government intend to introduce a distinctive mark which accredited certification bodies will be permitted to use to denote their status.

"Standards, Quality and Inter-nation Competitiveness"

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to which objectives in his White Paper (Cmnd. 8621), "Standards, Quality and Inter-nation Competitiveness", he will be giving priority to in the current year.

Mr. Butcher: The Goverment intend to press ahead with implementing all aspects of the White Paper proposals. Major targets will include; broadening the scope and appeal of the national quality campaign; expanding the coverage of certification schemes and activating voluntary arrangements for accrediting certification bodies; and work with the British Standards Institution to improve the responsiveness and effectiveness of standards-writing.

British Safety Council

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his responsibilities regarding the British Safety Council.

Mr. Butcher: The British Safety Council is a self-constituted body. It has no statutory authority or functions. But I consult it along with other organisations about proposed consumer safety legislation.

Church Services (Broadcasting)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to permit the broadcasting of church services, including the singing of hymns, on citizens' band radio.

Mr. Butcher: CB is intended for short duration two way communication and it is a condition of the licence that the transmission of music in any form is not permitted. The conditions are necessary because the frequencies available are limited and are for the use of all people, for business and pleasure. CB is not intended for broadcast purposes and I do not consider it would be in the interests of CB users as a whole for the licence conditions to be altered in the way the hon. Member suggests, particularly as church services are broadcast on radio and television.

Riding Hats

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ban the import from Korea and other countries of riding hats which do not conform to British Standards Institution approved safety standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Hats manufactured to the new British standard on riding hats (BS 6473) have been available for the last few months. The equestrian societies are recommending to their members that they buy hats to the new standard. I think in this case that the involvement of interested bodies is the best way of promoting improved safety. The Department will be taking steps to reinforce this publicity. In the circumstances, I see no need for legislation at present.

Under the general safety duty proposed in last July's White Paper on the Safety of Goods (Cmnd. 9302), the supply of riding hats that do not conform to BS 6473 may well become illegal, since the Secretary of State could approve that standard as satisfying the general duty. The clear implication of such an approval would be that riding hats offering less protection were unsafe in relation to sound modern standards of safety.

Telephones (BT Approval)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what information he has regarding the number of inspectors to approve applicants, and how many applicants are waiting certification for approved maintainers for British Telecom approved telephone systems following the changes of 1 January;

(2) what provision has been made for the certification of approved maintainers for British Telecom approved telephone systems following the changes of 1 January.

Mr. Butcher: In accordance with condition 8 of the class licence for the running branch telecommunication systems, (granted under section 7 of the Telecommunications Act 1984) maintenance contractors require approval under section 20 of that Act only for the purpose of maintaining telephone call routing apparatus connected to public switched telephone networks. There is no such requirement for maintainers of any other type of telecommunication apparatus.

Such approval will normally only be given when the applicant has obtained registration under the relevant scheme run by the British Standards Institution (BSI). BSI, which has supplied the following information, currently employs two assessors for dealing with applications for registration, and two inspectors for the periodic surveillance of companies once registration has been given. BSI is currently seeking to recruit a third assessor. As at 7 February 1985, 57 applications for registration were pending. In 53 of these cases BSI is awaiting action by the applicants concerned. 26 companies have been registered by BSI.

In exceptional cases, and particularly where the marketing of newly approved apparatus or of apparatus that has newly qualified for competitive maintenance is otherwise likely to be seriously delayed, approval may be granted provisionally in advance of BSI registration.

On 31 December 1984 newly-installed analogue call-routing apparatus, in the form of private branch exchanges with not more than 120 extensions and certain single exchange line systems, became eligible for competitive maintenance. On 27 September 1984, BSI had extended its registration scheme to cover maintenance of these classes of apparatus; my Department's announcement on 21 September 1984 of this extension included an invitation to apply for registration and approval.

Micro-electronics

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to liaise with the Ministries of Trade and Industry in France and the Federal Republic of Germany on advances made in those countries in their use of micro-electronics; and what investment he intends to make to enable British firms employing more than 20 people to use micro-electronics.

Mr. Butcher: Officials of the Department are in contact with their counterparts in France and the Federal Republic of Germany. This liaison includes the developing use of micro-electronics in all three countries.

The use of micro-electronics by British firms is promoted through the Micro-electronics Application Project (MAP) operated by the Department. Support is provided by the provision of seminars, industrial training, together with advice and consultancy for potential users. In addition, financial assistance has been provided for firms developing the use of micro-electronics in both products or processes. Currently this latter, in common with other R&D support activities of the Department, is under review. A statement on the future of selective financial assistance for industrial R&D, including MAP, will be made shortly.

EC (Insurance)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what restrictions are placed on insurance companies based in other member states of the Common Market in the provision of car insurance for residents of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if there are any licensing or authorisation procedures required by his Department before Common Market-based insurance companies can underwrite car insurance for United Kingdom residents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Any insurance company carrying on insurance business in the United Kingdom must be authorised by the Secretary of State under the Insurance Companies Act 1982. However, offshore insurance companies which are not authorised here are permitted to solicit for business, and United Kingdom residents are free to place insurance business with such companies by remitting premiums either directly or through intermediaries. All insurance companies providing compulsory

Speed Limits

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report complete details of all speed limits currently in force on United Kingdom roads for each class of private and commercial vehicle.

Mrs. Chalker: Motor cycles and cars (passenger vehicles with up to 8 passenger seats) and car derived vans, not towing a trailer are subject to the national road speed limits, which are 70 mph on motorways and dual carriageways and 60 mph on other roads. Such vehicles when towing trailers and all other motor vehicles are subject to the limits detailed in Schedule 6 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, chapter 27, unless a lower road speed limit applies.

These limits relate to the main classes of vehicle as follows:

	Motorways	Dual Carriageways	Miles per hour Other Roads
Buses and Coaches	70	60	50
Goods Vehicles:
(i) under 7·5 tonnes m.l.w.*	70	60	50
(ii) over 7·5 tonnes m.l.w.	60	50	40
Private cars, car derived vans and motorcycles towing one trailer	50	50	50

* m.l.w.: maximum laden weight.

Traffic Statistics

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the volume of motor vehicle traffic, in billion vehicle kilometres, for the years 1963 to 1983.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Motor traffic (Great Britain): billion vehicle kilometres

Road Transport (Statistics)

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state, for each of the following industrial categories, the tonnage of goods lifted and the proportion accounted for by road transport in 1983: (a) building materials, timber and aggregates, (b) food, drink and tobacco, (c) petroleum products, (d) coal and coke, (e) iron and steel, (f) chemicals and fertilizers, (g) other goods and (h) all goods.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Domestic freight lifted in Great Britain 1983 (million tonnes)

Commodity	*Total tonnes lifted	Per cent. by road
Building materials, timber and aggregates	501	96
Food, drink and tobacco	307	99
Petroleum products	213	31

Chemicals and fertilizers	59	95
Other goods	384	97
All goods lifted	1,698	83

* By road, rail, inland waterways, coastal shipping and pipeline.

M25 (Accident)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what lessons have now been learned from the major accident on the M25 on 11 December; what action is being taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The accident on the M25 on 11 December last year was distinguished from other multiple crashes on motorways by the subsequent intense fire and the high death toll, but in its general nature and causes it was not uncommon.

Investigation by the police of the circumstances surrounding the accident lead to the conclusion that the accident was caused by some drivers travelling at excessive speeds at a time when dense but isolated banks of fog were likely to be encountered. The danger inherent in such behaviour should be well known to all drivers, but my Department intends to step up its publicity concerning the need for extra care while driving in foggy conditions. We are also instituting new studies to identify any stretches of the M25 and M42 particularly liable to fog and shall be installing experimental fog detectors on a section of the M25.

Railway Accidents (Reports)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that the findings of any inquiry or investigation into railway accidents resulting in personal injury are made available to the public within 14 days of those findings being concluded.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under existing legislation I am required to make public, in such manner as I think expedient, the reports made by inspectors appointed under the legislation to investigate particular railway accidents. When an investigation is made other than by a specially appointed inspector there is no requirement for the findings to be made public. I can give no guarantee that formal reports by Inspectors will always be published within 14 days of the conclusion of their inquiries, although we endeavour to publish these reports as quickly as circumstances allow.

Railway Accident (Rugby)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of his letter to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth dated 4 February, together with the annexed statement by his Department's railway inspectorate, concerning the circumstances surrounding the railway accident at Rugby on 9 December 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: I share to the full my hon. Friend's concern that there should be made available a simple statement of the facts about such a railway accident as occurred at Rugby on 9 December 1984. I am placing in the Library of the House a copy of the letter my right hon. Friend wrote to my hon. Friend together with a statement of the facts about the accident at Rugby, and we propose to discuss with the chairman of the British Railways Board whether some simpler way can be found of conveying the facts that are ascertained by the board's own inquiries in those cases where a formal inquiry by one of our railway inspectors has not been ordered.

Roads (Safety Barriers)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many applications by local authorities for the installation of safety barriers on trunk roads have been refused in each of the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what criteria must be satisfied before safety barriers are installed on trunk roads in England;

(3) what are the current specifications for safety barriers on motorways and on trunk roads;

(4) what data are available to his Department on the performance of road safety barriers;

(5) what is his estimate of the natural life of safety barriers on motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: Current specifications for the five types of safety fences and barrier used on trunk roads are contained in the Specification for Road and Bridgeworks published by HMSO, supplemented by transport and road research laboratory drawings, the supplement No. 1 to the Specification and by the Department's technical memorandum H973. The estimated life of steel safety fences is in excess of 20 years and of concrete barriers in excess of 40 years when they remain undamaged by the impact of vehicles.

Criteria for their provision on central reserves are that the appropriate type shall be installed on all new motorways and on new all purpose dual carriageway trunk roads estimated to carry 30,000 vehicles per day in the year of opening where the central reserve is less than 6 metres wide. On lengths of existing trunk roads not less than 5 km and normally over 10 km long and on existing motorways they are provided where the fatal accident rate over 3 years is more than 0·2 per km per year of which half involve crossing the central reserve.

No records are kept of the number of applications made by local authorities and others for the provision of safety fences and barriers on trunk roads and motorways where they are not already installed. Of the order of 6 cases have been refused in the last 5 years, but some of these have been and are being re-considered.

Accident data are available to the Department which suggest that safety fences and barriers perform satifactorily in preventing serious accidents in the great majority of cases in which they are involved. Only 2 or 3 cases per year are reported where they have been penetrated by vehicles, causing casualties. Extensive testing by vehicular impact is carried out on the various types of safety fence before they are approved for installation.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport what lengths of safety barriers have been replaced on motorways and on trunk roads in England each year for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Chalker: The information sought is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Trinity House

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to provide assistance to Trinity House to enable it to place its order for one or two buoyage and lighthouse tenders in the United Kingdom rather than overseas.

Mr. David Mitchell: Trinity House has sought my right hon. Friend's statutory consent for the expenditure that would fall on the general lighthouse fund if an order for tenders were placed. Financial assistance from public funds would not be available to Trinity House for that purpose, but if an order were placed in the United Kingdom the shipbuilder might seek assistance from the Intervention Fund: that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Coal Imports

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list quarter by quarter the tonnages of coal imports at individual coastal towns during 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that monthly information of broadly this kind is available from the Bill of Entry section of HM Customs and Excise.

EMPLOYMENT

Earnings

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has that the employment prospects of groups with above average earnings are linked with changes in their real or relative earnings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is evidence of a general link between pay and jobs, and I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 6 February 1985 at column 586. There is no specific evidence on the employment effects of changes in real or relative earnings of groups with above average earnings.

Doctors

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many qualified medical doctors are currently receiving unemployment benefit.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available.

South-West Region

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what further steps he will take to reduce unemployment in Bideford;

(2) if he will make a statement on employment prospects for 1985 for the south-west region.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaining its economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing while encouraging enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. That is the only way to generate lasting jobs in Bideford, the south west and elsewhere. In the meantime we are spending over £2 billion this year on a range of employment and training measures to help the unemployed, which are currently benefiting nearly 50,000 people in the south west region.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the current provision of jobcentre facilities in Bideford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes. The Manpower Services Commission has agreed proposals for the development of the employment service, which my right hon. Friend has recently endorsed. These provide for Bideford jobcentre to retain a full level of service.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Employment which of Her Majesty's Government's initiatives have been most successful in generating new employment in the south-west of England.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaining their economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging greater enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. This is the only way to generate lasting jobs in the south west and elsewhere. In addition, we are encouraging the growth of employment in the south west through initiatives such as the enterprise allowance scheme, which is currently helping some 3,300 people in the region to set up their own businesses, and the young workers scheme which is currently benefiting over 7000 youngsters. Moreover many parts of the south west continue to enjoy assisted area status.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current trend in unemployment in the south-west of England.

Mr. Alan Clark: The seasonally adjusted level of unemployment (excluding school leavers) increased in the south-west region by 2,100 between December and January. Over the six months to January, which probably gives the best guide to the current trend, there was an average increase of 1,600 per month.

Collective Agreements

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he has taken following the judgment of the European Court of Justice in Case 165/82, Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom, to amend the law in respect of provisions contained in collective agreements which are not in conformity with the obligations of the European Community equal treatment directive.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have been considering the implications of the judgment and shall bring forward proposals as soon as I can.

Liverpool (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Minister of State's recent visit to Liverpool.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 8 February I visited Liverpool where I presented prizes to the winners and runners-up of a youth training scheme business game. This competition, which was jointly sponsored by the Manpower Services Commission and the Liverpool junior chamber of commerce and administered by Deloitte, Haskins and Sells, provides youngsters with an opportunity to learn something of the business world and to appreciate the importance of decision making, finance, team work and risk taking.

Labour Statistics (Burnley)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Burnley travel-to-work area have participated for the last three months for which figures are available in job release schemes.

Mr. Alan Clark: The number in the Burnley travel-to-work area in receipt of an allowance under the job release scheme was 343 in November 1984, 339 in December 1984 and 330 in January 1985.

EC Funds

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total allocation of funds within the 1983 European Economic Community budget to the social fund to help with projects for young people; how much of this money has been spent on helping to give young people within the United Kingdom employment; what discussions he has had with the European Economic Community Commission about this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The European Economic Community budget for 1983 had an allocation of about £531 million available to the social fund to assist with projects for young people. The United Kingdom's share of this amount was £240·7 million (45·2 per cent.) and this money is being claimed when payments fall due. These allocations were discussed with officials of the European Commission at the time through normal procedures. They provide a very welcome contribution to employment and training measures for young people.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the total allocation of funds within the 1983 European Economic Community budget to the social fund to assist the textile industry; how much of this money has been spent on helping the textile industry within the United Kingdom; what discussions he has had with the European Economic Community Commission about this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The European Economic Community budget for 1983 had an allocation of about £16·5 million available to the social fund to assist workers in the textiles and clothing industries. Of this amount the United Kingdom's share was £3·7 million (22·4 per cent.) and this money is being claimed when payments fall due.

These allocations were discussed with officials of the European Commission at the time through normal procedures. They provide a very welcome contribution to employment and training measures in the textiles and clothing industries.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. John Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of mode A places in youth training scheme schemes and what proportion of mode B places available in September 1984 have now been taken up.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 18]: I regret the information is not available in the precise form requested. However, about 77 per cent. of approved mode A places and 85 per cent. of approved mode B places were occupied by the end of December.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Helsinki Accord (Monitoring)

30. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedures are available for monitoring progress on the Helsinki accord; and if he has made representations about the position of Mr. Josef Berenstein and his family in the Soviet Union through these procedures.

Mr. Rifkind: A series of special follow-up meetings were agreed in 1983 at Madrid to discuss a wide range of CSCE issues. The human rights provisions will be the subject of such a special meeting to be held in Ottawa in May and June 1985. The specific case of Mr. Josef Berenstein and his family has not to our knowledge been raised in the conference on security and co-operation in Europe context but his plight and that of many others like him is something we shall have very much in mind in our preparations for the Ottawa meeting.

Extradition (Spain)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the negotiations he has been conducting with Spain for a new extradition treaty.

Mr. Renton: Exchanges are continuing with the Spanish authorities with a view to finding a mutually acceptable basis for a new extradition treaty.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the amount of overtime payments for his office for each year since 1979.

Mr. Renton: The amount of overtime payments made to employees of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (including the Passport Office which was transferred to the Home Office as from 1 April 1984) was as follows for the last six financial years.

1983-84	5,151,837

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff have been and are employed by his office on a short-term contract for each year since 1979.

Mr. Renton: The numbers are:

Year	Aid wing	Diplomatic
1980	4,283	36
1981	3,602	28

Mr. Adam Fergusson

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the appointment of Adam Fergusson as an adviser to his Department; and what is his salary, length of tenure, role in the Department and his qualifications.

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Adam Fergusson was appointed by my right hon. and learned Friend on 4 February 1985 as my special adviser on European Community affairs with particular responsibility for maintaining contact with members of the European Parliament on Community and other issues.

In accordance with long-standing procedures for such appointments, his tenure is for the duration of the present Administration or when my right hon. and learned Friend leaves office or moves to another appointment. His salary is £21,313, the minimum of the scale appropriate for this appointment.

Mr. Fergusson was a member of the European Parliament from 1979 to 1984, during which period he served as a member of the Political Affairs Committee and in other capacities.

Margaret Hicks

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has received from the French Ministry of External Relations since making representations on behalf of Margaret Hicks for payment of compensation due to her for the loss of her yacht in Papeete on 30 September 1983.

Mr. Renton: The French Ministry of External Relations informed Her Majesty's embassy in Paris on 28 January that it awaited comment from the examining magistrate in Papeete. The embassy has been instructed to continue to press the Ministry with a view to bringing the matter to a satisfactory conclusion as rapidly as possible.

Syrian Nationals (Deportation)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what explanation has been given to him by the Syrian chargé d'affaires for the possession of a Syrian diplomatic passport by one of the men deported from the United Kingdom on 29 January, but not accredited to the Syrian embassy in London.

Mr. Luce: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) on 8 February at column 749.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the diplomatic status of the four men holding Syrian passports arrested by the Metropolitan police and deported on 29 January.

Mr. Luce: None was accredited to the Syrian embassy in London but one carried a Syrian diplomatic passport in addition to a normal Syrian passport.

Kampuchea

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance, direct or indirect, Her Majesty's Government are giving to the Kampuchean rebel leader Son Sann and his supporters.

Mr. Luce: We give some modest assistance, solely of a humanitarian nature, to Mr. Son Sann's organisation and to that of Prince Sihanouk to help relieve hardship caused by Vietnam's occupation of Cambodia.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Ministers or officials had meetings with Son Soubert, son of the Kampuchean rebel leader Son Sann, during his visit to London in January.

Mr. Luce: Mr. Son Soubert had no meetings with Ministers during his visit to London in January. He called on the head of South East Asian department at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

THE ARTS

Taxation (Acceptance in Lieu)

25. Sir David Price asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what is to be the total provision made for 1985-86 for acceptances of art objects in lieu of taxation; and whether the Minister for the Arts is satisfied that it is sufficient for him to fulfil his duty to the national heritage.

Mr. Waldegrave: The acceptance in lieu of tax provision for 1985-86 is £2 million. The amount must depend on what can be afforded.

Riverside Studios and London Orchestral Concert Board

27. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations the Minister for the Arts has had about the Arts Council's decision to cease funding the Riverside Studios and to reduce its grant to the London Orchestral Concert Board.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Libraries (Privatisation)

28. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he has any plans for the privatisation of libraries.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. It is, however, for the statutory authorities concerned to decide how far they want to contract out work which goes into the provision of the services of the library.

British Empire (Museum)

Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will make a statement on the proposal to create a museum of the history of the British empire.

Mr. Waldegrave: My noble Friend the Minister for the Arts has recently received a copy of the feasibility study prepared for National Heritage on the creation of a museum of the British empire. He has not been asked to back the project with Government funding, which could clearly be very difficult at the present time.

It will be for National Heritage to decide how to take the project forward.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid

Mr. George Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid is provided by the European Economic Community to countries outside those specified in the Lomé protocols.

Mr. Timothy Raison: The European Community's expenditure on overseas aid in 1983 to developing countries not associated with the Community under the Lomé Convention was $379·25 million (£250 million). This includes both food and financial aid.

Sub-Sahara Africa (Special Facility)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will be eligible for offshore procurement arising from the World Bank special facility for sub-Saharan Africa on the same terms as the countries which are contributing to it.

Mr. Raison: It is the intention that procurement access under the facility will be extended to those counries which care committing bilateral aid, provided that the aid is offered on the same terms as direct financial contributions to the facility. In practice, that means that the bilateral aid is offered on grant or very soft loan terms and is untied. Our aid will be on grant terms to the countries to which funds from the facility are likely to be made available but we are still considering whether it will be untied.

International Fund for Agricultural Development

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what issues will be on the agenda at the forthcoming meeting of the International Fund for Agricultural Development; and what views Her Majesty's Government's representative will be putting forward in relation to funding of the second replenishment.

Mr. Raison: At the next meeting, the British representative will be working for agreement on the main outstanding issue on he agenda, that of equitable burden sharing between the two principal categories of donors, namely the OECD and OPEC countries.

LORD PRIVY SEAL

Magistrates (Lancashire)

Mr. Pike asked the Lord Privy Seal how many magistrates were appointed to each bench in Lancashire in each of the last five years.

Mr. Biffen: The number appointed to each bench are listed in the following table.

Disabled and Elderly Persons

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to bring forward draft regulations requiring developers to take specific account of the needs of the disabled and the elderly.

Mr. Gow: The Department has carried out a public consultation on draft regulations to require the provision of access to all floors of new shops and offices and other new single storey public buildings.

I intend to introduce new building regulations as soon as possible to require the provision of access for disabled people to such buildings.

The proposed regulations will be extended to other types of public buildings as soon as a comprehensive technical code is available on means of escape for disabled people in the event of fire.

Sewage Waste

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what schemes or experiments his Department has been involved concerning the use of sewage waste in (a) Wiltshire and (b) England and Wales: (1) with private landowners, (ii) with local authorities and (iii) on its own land.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Wintex-Cimex '85 Exercise

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment with respect to Wintex '85, what Government officers and departments were represented at the last meeting of the North East Regional Emergency Committee.

Mr. Waldegrave: The last meeting of the North East Regional Emergency Committee was not concerned with Wintex '85.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the involvement of the regional directors of his Department responsible for the north east of England in Wintex '85.

Mr. Waldegrave: Regional directors of my Department will not be involved in Wintex '85.

North Eastern Regional Emergency Committee.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Northumbria and Durham police forces are represented on the north eastern regional emergency committee; if he will list the names and ranks of personnel involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. The committee meets infrequently and the representatives will vary from time to time.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the powers of the north east regional emergency committee; if he will list the names and function of the members of the committee; and under what circumstances the committee would assume these powers.

Mr. Waldegrave: The committee is chaired by the regional director of the Departments of the Environment and Transport with representatives from a number of Government Departments such as Environment; Transport; Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; Employment; Trade and Industry; Energy; Health and Social Security and the Central Office of Information. The committee also has a military and police representative appointed by the Ministry of Defence and the Home Office respectively.

Regional emergency committees would normally be activated only in an emergency which threatened seriously to disrupt the supply and distribution of essential supplies in the regions. The main purpose of the committees would be to co-ordinate, under central government direction, arrangements for maintainng essential supplies and services, and to act as a channel of communication with authorities and organisations concerned.

Archaeological and Historic Artefacts (Whitehall)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what has been the total cost to his Department of protecting archaeological and historic interests in the excavations between Richmond Terrace, Whitehall, and Norman Shaw North;

(2) what artefacts or other items of archaeological or historical interest have been (a) identified and (b) preserved in the excavation for the building works behind Richmond Terrace, Whitehall, and the Norman Shaw North Building;

(3) what agencies have been involved in investigating and monitoring the archaeological and historical aspects of the excavations between Richmond Terrace, Whitehall, and the Norman Shaw North Building.

Mr. Macfarlane: The inner London archaeological unit undertook a small survey of part of this site in 1980 and a more extensive investigation was carried out by the central excavation unit of the Department of the Environment between May and July 1983. Very little of archaeological or historic interest was found and no significant costs were incurred on further protection.

Rates Revaluation

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when Her Majesty's Government propose to honour the commitments contained in paragraph 5.8 of Cmnd. 9008, entitled, "Rates", published in August 1983, to carry out a non-domestic rate revaluation.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 22 October at column 491.

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any evidence to suggest that domestic properties in the north of England may, as in the case of industrial properties, be generally over-rated relative to the south-east.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the average length of time required to process applications to his Department under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for each of the metropolitan county councils, Greater London council and the Inner London education authority;

Sir George Young: Three. The dates were 1 November 1984, 26 November 1984 and 3 December 1984.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the longest period a case submitted under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 has remained with his Department before consent was given.

Sir George Young: One hundred and thirty-two days. The delay in issuing consent was due entirely to the GLC's failure to supply basic information necessary to enable proper consideration to be given to its application.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff are employed by his Department, and what are their grades, to process consent applications under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Sir George Young: Six, for contracts totalling £3·8613 million. One, value £298,500, was frozen blanched chips.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the managerial and administrative implications of sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 on local authorities.

Sir George Young: To a large extent the implications will depend upon decisions and organisational arrangements made by the local authorities concerned. The Department will continue to make whatever arrangements are necessary to ensure that applications for consent are dealt with expeditiously. General consents have been issued relating to a number of activities falling within the provisions of the Act.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will grant a general consent for all projects excluding the enterprise boards funded under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, from the provisions of section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Some general consents have already been issued and my right hon. Friend is considering the need for a further general consent under section 7 of the Act as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when a further series of general consents will be issued under sections 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is keeping the position under review. Further general consents under sections 8 and 9 of the Act will be brought forward as necessary, consistent with the need to prevent activities which are prejudicial to the Government's abolition proposals.

Sir George Young: 79 from a variety of bodies, including voluntary and community groups.

South Yorkshire (Asbestos)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to safeguard public health following the deposition of asbestos in parts of South Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health and Social Security said in his answer to the hon. Member on 20 December 1984, at column 305 that the health risk in this case was negligible. The primary responsibility for protecting public health in these circumstances rests with the local authority, and I am informed that adequate measures were taken by the authorities concerned.

Merseyside (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Merseyside.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I visited Merseyside on 8 February 1985.

In the morning I met representatives of Knowsley borough council. Later I met the press and then went to meet senior management officials of Bibby Edible Oils Ltd. and see the derelict Brocklebank Dock site where Bibby's intend to build a new factory. Afterwards I opened the Southport information technology centre.

In the afternoon in addition to two political engagements I met representatives of Sefton borough council and officially opened the renovated Southport town hall. Finally, I visited the Radio City studios to take in its "Taking Issue" programme.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many plastic bullets have been fired in Northern Ireland in 1984 and since the beginning of the current year; in what circumstances; in what location the bullets were fired; how many bullets were fired; and if any persons were injured as a result of the use of plastic bullets.

Mr. Scott: 1,768 plastic baton rounds were fired in Northern Ireland during 1984, 4 rounds have been fired so far this year. Police records show that 42 people were allegedly injured by plastic baton rounds in 1984. There have been no reports of anyone having been injured this year. I am writing to the hon. Member with the information he has requested about the circumstances and places in which the baton rounds were fired. A copy of my letter will be placed in the Library.

Non-scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separately for magistrates courts and Crown courts for 1984 the number of cases involving non-scheduled offences in which pleas of not guilty were entered; in how many of these cases verdicts of not guilty were returned; and in how many of these cases trial was by jury.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

	1984
	Crown courts	Magistrates courts
Pleas 'not guilty' entered	195	6,357
Verdicts 'not guilty' returned	96	2,410

In all non-scheduled cases tried in the Crown courts, trial is by jury.

Notes:

1. The figures refer only to the principal offence.
2. The figures for the magistrates' court include motoring offences.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separately for magistrates' courts and for Crown courts in each of the years 1980, 1981 and 1982 and to date, the number of court cases involving non-scheduled offences in which a plea of not guilty was entered; and in how many of these cases a verdict of not guilty was returned.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 713-14]: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Crown court		Magistrates' court
	Pleas "Not Guilty" Entered	Verdicts "Not Guilty" Returned	Pleas "Not Guilty" Entered	Verdicts "Not Guilty" Returned
1980	113	74	3,025	1,321
1981	141	96	5,214	2,249
1982	145	81	6,119	2,532
1983	176	92	6,154	2,774
1984	195	96	6,357	2,410

Notes:

1. The above figures refer only to the principal offence.
2. Figures for the magistrates' courts include motoring offences.

Beef

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the number of beef cattle slaughtered in Northern Ireland in each of the last four years.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

Year	*Beef Cattle Slaughtered
1981	465,535
1982	362,952
1983	455,935
1984	532,870

* Note: Clean cattle only i.e. steers and heffers.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the average price of beef cattle sold in Northern Ireland dead-weight in each of the last four years.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

Beef Cattle average market price pence per kilogramme deadweight*

Year
1981	156·17
1982	176·43
1983	175·11
1984	175·23

* Clean cattle only: ie steers and heifers.

Dairy Farmers

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland with fewer than 40 cows have left the industry in the last 12 months.

Dr. Boyson: This information is not readily available. The agricultural census shows that the overall number of farms with dairy cows fell by 88 from 8,171 to 8,083 between June 1983 and June 1984. The number of dairy herds of less than 40 cows fell from 5,341 to 5,207, a decline of 134, but this cannot be taken as the number of farmers who have left the industry; some herds may have expanded, others may have contracted from higher size groups.

Sewage Disposal

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the volume of sewage sludge which has been transported to and dumped at the East Antrim coastal area of Drain's Bay, Larne, in each of the last five years for which records are available; and how much of the above sewage sludge originated outside Larne borough council area.

Mr. Chris Patten: Figures for the volume of sewage sludge from septic tanks and small sewage treatment works transported by tanker to the retention tank at Drains Bay (Black Cave North) before discharge at the sea outfall are available only for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Gallons in 000's (approx)

	1982	1983	1984
Sludge transported by tanker to Black Cave North	1,008	1,270	832
Volume originating outside Larne borough council area	481	615	398

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many different types of major sewage disposal schemes for Larne are under consideration at this time by the Department of the Environment; what is the estimated cost of each scheme; and how effective each scheme has been evaluated to be in sewage treatment.

Mr. Chris Patten: Two major sewage disposal schemes for Larne are under consideration. One scheme involves the construction of retention tanks at Redlands industrial estate which would discharge the town sewage to the sea through the existing outfall at Sandy Bay in suitable tidal conditions. The cost of this scheme is estimated at £935,000.

An alternative scheme would involve discharge of the town sewage through a new outfall in the Black Cave area. A marine survey will be required to confirm the suitability of this proposal and until this has been assessed, no estimate of cost can be made.

In both cases the effluent will be processed to remove or break up solid materials. It is common practice at coastal sites throughout the United Kingdom, where dilution factors and dispersion patterns are favourable, to discharge sewage after such treatment via submarine outfalls.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the cost of accidents on non-built up roads in Northern Ireland with (a) speed limits of 60 miles per hour and (b) speed limits of 70 miles per hour; and if, in each case, he will indicate whether the roads or streets are lit or not.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested could only be provided at disproportionate cost. I can, however, advise my hon. Friend that the total cost of road accidents in Northern Ireland for 1983 is estimated at £57,162,000.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were convicted in 1984, either on their own admission of guilt or following a plea of not guilty, on the basis of evidence given by accomplices on behalf of the Crown in cases concerning scheduled offences in Northern Ireland; how many suspects arrested on the basis of such evidence have been released as a result of the retraction of evidence given by accomplices; and how many people are presently awaiting trial as a result of evidence obtained from terrorist accomplices.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: Eleven persons were convicted in cases concerning scheduled offences during 1984 following trials in which the evidence of a former accomplice was given on behalf of the Crown. A further 10 persons were convicted on the basis of their statements of admission made during enquiries arising from the evidence of a former accomplice.

It is not possible to associate directly the number of persons released with the withdrawal of evidence by alleged accomplices, because arrested persons may be released for other reasons and because persons who have been charged on such evidence may also face criminal charges on other grounds. However, the available records show that in 1984, following the withdrawal of evidence by alleged accomplices, some or all of the charges against 21 persons were dropped.

On 28 January 1985, 112 persons were on remand or had been returned for trial for scheduled offences in cases in which it was intended that an alleged accomplice would give evidence for the Crown.

Security Statistics

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for 1984 are now available, together with details of persons charged with terrorist-type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for that year.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 712-13]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland gave to a question by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) on 7 February 1985, at column 650-52.

WALES

Regional Development Grant

6. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the percentage of the working population in the counties of Dyfed, West Glamorgan and Mid-Glamorgan who resided in assisted areas eligible for regional development grant before the changes that took effect in the assisted area map on 29 November 1984; and what is the equivalent percentage figure now.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information on a county basis relates to employee population. Prior to 29 November 1984, the percentages were Dyfed 73 per cent., West Glamorgan 38 per cent. and Mid-Glamorgan 100 per cent. The percentage still eligible for automatic grant under the new two-tier system is now 25 per cent., 33 per cent. and 65 per cent. respectively. However, 77 per cent. of Dyfed and the whole of the other two counties will of course remain eligible for selective financial assistance.

A55 (Roadworks)

20. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will report progress on the A55 roadworks for a dual carriageway along the north Wales coast; if the works are currently on time; and when he expects the A55 dual carriageway to be completed.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: We are making good progress in upgrading the A55. Eleven sections have already been improved. These include the Hawarden bypass and stage I of the Colwyn Bay bypass opened by my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts) in September and December 1984 respectively. The remaining section of the Colwyn Bay bypass will be opened in the early summer. Work is in progress on stage 2 of the Holywell bypass and a contract for the Bodelwyddan bypass should be let shortly. Preparation work on the remaining stages is well in hand and we expect substantially to complete the upgrading around the turn of the decade.

Welsh Plant Breeding Station, Aberystwyth

21. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to cut financial aid during the next five years to the Welsh plant breeding station at Gogerddan, Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The effects on individual institutions of the overall reduction in planned expenditure on research and development for 1986-87 and 1987-88 announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 22 January have yet to be determined.

Statutory Bodies (Confidential Statements)

22. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure that statutory bodies in Wales do not make confidential settlements in circumstances such as happened with the claim made by the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation for defects at the University hospital of Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I shall consider each case on its merits and will of course ensure accountability to the Public Accounts Committee. This was specifically provided for in the terms of this particular settlement. However, it is essential always to bear in mind the need to protect the interests of the taxpayer.

Wintex Cimex '85 Exercises

14. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total costs of the Wintex Cimex '85 exercises attributable to his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Approximately £850.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department's officials involved in Wintex '85 will be liaising with the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation at Carmarthen.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply he received from my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 30 November 1984 at column 597.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the alert state Fandango 85 will apply to his Department's facilities in connection with Wintex '85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department has no knowledge of this matter.

Milk Quotas

15. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what submissions he has received from the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union concerning the securing of additional milk quotas for those areas of Wales defined as less favoured areas; and if he will make a statement.

[Mr. Colin Moynihan]

the Becket in the Old Kent road. Soon thereafter I joined the Boxing Board, along with other stewards whose sole service is to have the privilege of serving the active sportsmen, in our case the boxers, and the licence holders who support them.

Having declared my interest I should like to substantiate my view that professional boxing should be at its zenith. To begin with, we have record levels of boxers who are licensed by the board. Hon. Members should consider the facts. For example, 1974, 1975 and 1976 saw 242, 356 and 395 licensed boxers participating in 150 tournaments. Over the past three years the figures have stood at 538, 576 and 551, with over 242 tournaments last year alone.

Recently, the British Boxing Board of Control for the first time since its inception in 1929 was accepted as a full member of the World Boxing Association. Now our fighters can challenge for WBC and WBA titles.

Only last year, television policy limited coverage to two live and two delayed contests in a year. Today, after a carefully monitored 12-month pilot scheme to ensure the prevention of studio boxing, licensed promoters can have 20 shows televised in total on the national network. That is a reflection, not only of the increasing popularity of the sport and of the high viewing figures, but of the substantial public support that exists, as those attending promotions will know. The advent of increased television coverage, although it has meant administrative problems, will, we hope, mean that more people connected with the sport will try their hand at promoting, and may themselves develop into major forces to challenge any recent tendencies towards monopoly, thereby becoming capable of staging world title fights, and enabling boxers from the regions to have the chance of boxing before their home crowds and audiences. It should be healthy to have two major promoters. It should not develop into an internal battle at the expense of the sport.

To match this growth in activity, unrivalled medical controls and safeguards are implemented by the board. Boxing in Britain leads the world in assessing, maintaining and developing standards of medical control. It was we, the British, who introduced the universal boxing passport two years ago, now carried by all boxers under the aegis of the World Boxing Council, and containing specific medical and boxing records. It is we who have sought to improve the state of boxers' fitness and the degree of medical control.

Before any boxer is considered for a licence he must have the official medical examination form completed. This form must be completed every year when his licence is due for renewal. In addition, every boxer is examined before every contest in which he takes part, and again after each contest.

A minimum of two medical officers must attend every tournament. Incidentally, many of them are members of the British Medical Association. The medical arguments outlined in the BMA report published last year do not, I believe, stand up to examination. The moral question is, of course, worthy of consideration and debate, and I put it on record that I am as fully aware as anyone of the hazards of the sport, and, certainly as far as professional boxing is concerned, so are the participants.

Professional boxing is undertaken through consent. Banning it would drive it underground without adequate medical supervision, as in unlicensed shows. The continuation of the sport under those circumstances, devoid of stringent medical safeguards, would be unacceptable to me.

As Eric Armit, a respected boxing statistician, said:

"When our sport is attacked we all close ranks. All that I ask is that we must never close our minds to the fact that boxing is about boxers and we should always be looking for ways to increase their safety."

The real danger to the future of the sport—my prime intention today is to draw this to the attention of the House—derives from the threat to boxing from within its ranks. Let us consider the board's role. The board has accepted many of the challenges of today's world. Since its inception in 1929 some outstanding stewards have helped to promote the interests of the sport. The board is not financially interested and has been totally independent. It could be said that the board comprised moneyed Corinthians. In the past the board has been able to devote a great deal of time to boxing. Not only do the board's members seek to influence through rules and regulations, but they offer arbitration services for disputes among licence holders.

The tempo of life today is different. The Corinthians of the past were not burdened with instant media coverage or by huge financial deals. Perhaps the Corinthians have gone. Perhaps the board is sticking too hard and fast to a non-financially interested status. Perhaps it should consider restricting its involvement in the sport to administration. Perhaps it should look for statutory backing through a charter responsible to the Minister. Perhaps it should withdraw from arbitration between licence holders.

In the old days licence holders would go to the stewards with a range of problems. They were the best benevolent oligarchies ever known. I still like to think that the board is benevolent, but the concept of oligarchy is now as outmoded as the Corinthian ideal.

Some would argue that the board performs best in assessing where the sport is going, developing policies for television and protecting the six-rounders. These are valid questions and the board should never cease to address them.

What about the promoters? I remind those involved in unnecessary litigation over technical actions, which can only damage the sport, that the only finance generated by the board comes from the licence holders. Traditionally, that has rightly been kept at a low level. Unlike football and other sports, boxing does not enjoy direct handouts. The board does not promote the sport, own venues, have fixture lists or act as impresarios. Yet today we are using money from many Peters to defend against a few Pauls.

There comes a time when the figures involved in litigation are greater than the resources available to the board. When the board shrinks from doing what it believes to be right because of monetary restraints, the sport will be under serious threat. When the board looks for the easy way out because the course that it believes to be right cannot be pursued due to the cost of litigation, it will be time for the board to go.

Before Conteh, in the 1970s, I cannot recall the last time that the board was taken to court. Perhaps the last time involved Sullivan in the 1940s. Apart from the first action with Conteh the board has lost no further cases. The cost of defending the litigation currently pending on two High Court actions could far outstretch the board's present reserves of about £100,000.

I for one do not believe that I could stand in the House, or anywhere else, and defend the future of professional boxing, despite my deep commitment to the sport, without the medical control and supervision that is exercised by the board and is respected worldwide. The safety of the boxers is paramount and their interests must be served first. The main fight is between rival factions, which has resulted in litigation, with the non-financially interested board in the middle. Of course people should be entitled to ply their trade within the law and any constraint on their freedom is lawful only if it is reasonable.

The board believes that such constraints as it imposes are reasonable and fair. Indeed, the board's regulations are open to change at annual general meetings and embrace all licence holders. It is there that the opportunity to change the rules exists. I accept that all licence holders are professional business men, but let us consider the analogy of planning control. One cannot build on a piece of land irrespective of anyone else. The law is there to protect the public at large from the whims of the individual. Similarly, once a man takes out a licence and accepts the British Boxing Board of Control's regulations he cannot expect to promote when and where he wants, irrespective of clashes of dates or the future interests of the sport. The general body of rules and regulations protect all the promoters and licence holders and, above all, secure the future of the sport.

We must recognise that the future of British boxing is at stake. The board has a duty to respond to a world of boxing far removed from that which faced its Corinthian predecessors. It is doing just that. There is an onus on promoters to put on the very best shows to encourage the paying public to continue their support. Above all, there is an overriding duty to promote the interests of the boxers who are the sport's greatest asset.

I have tried to restrict my comments to under the usual 15 minutes to allow the hon. Member—although on this occasion it would be fair to say my hon. Friend—for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) to contribute to the debate. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is agreeable to that.

2.46 pm

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I thank the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) and the Minister for their generosity in allowing me to have my tuppence worth—more likely my five minutes' worth—on this important subject. I commend the hon. Gentleman not only on his choice of subject but on the way that he has spoken, which was very commendable. It is probably the only subject on which we agree. We both broke sweat in the ring for the dark blues at Oxford, which qualifies us more than most hon. Members to speak about this subject.

There is no doubt that boxing is under threat, and the House knows that. It is under threat from the British Medical Association which, at its Manchester delegate conference, agreed to campaign actively to ban the sport —even though only a minority of members took part in the conference. It is campaigning, and we must take the threat seriously.

Everyone knows that boxing can be dangerous, and I do not exclude the hon. Gentleman from that comment. It must have affected him because otherwise he would be not on the Conservative Benches but on the Opposition Benches. However, boxing has a good record in this country. There have been 10 deaths since 1945—10 too many — with two deaths during the past 15 years. Putting that statistic in the context of other sports, the number of deaths in boxing pales into insignificance—if one can use that expression about death. That applies also to serious injuries, and I am sure that the Minister agrees with that.

Unless we are to be a nation that wraps itself in cotton wool, we must accept that a person entering competitive sport will get hurt at some stage. Tragically, some people will be killed. We must ensure that boxing remains in being while forever trying to ensure that the safeguards are maintained.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that a special mention should be made of the chief medical officer of the BBBC, Dr. Adrian Whiteson, and his staff. They have done a tremendous job to ensure that boxing is as safe as possible. Not a great deal of publicity has been given to their work. The number of boxers forced to retire by the board has received little publicity, and the same applies to boxers who have decided to quit. Colin Jones, with 33 bouts, will probably retire permanently, as will Charlie Magri with 33 bouts. Compare that with boxers like Ted "Kid" Lewis with 280 fights in less than five years, yet who lived to the ripe old age of 74. That would not be permitted today. Therefore, I support the hon. Gentleman and the BBBC.

I wish briefly to mention an area that is worrying us all. The subject, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Lewisham, East is vital to the good name of boxing. I refer to the allegations that a cartel is operating in boxing, as exposed by The Sunday Times last month. If Jarvis Astaire, Mickey Duff, Mike Barrett and Terry Lawless are guilty of those allegations, they must go to the BBBC and give it the fullest co-operation. Instead, one gathers, they are hiding behind their lawyers' apron strings. The board must not be inhibited by such tactics. We expect the board to be positive and firm in ensuring that boxing's good name is maintained.

In my submission, parliamentary privilege was established to assist people such as those members of the board who wish to get to the facts but who are inhibited from doing so by lawyers. I am sure that many hon. Members would be prepared to speak up for the BBBC in this matter. However, there is no substitute for the board, as the governing body of boxing, taking upon itself this role and doing it without help even from well-meaning hon. Members and others.

The Minister, who is sympathetic to boxing, cannot sit back overlong and allow this matter to drag on. As the custodian of British sport in the House, he must, if necessary, trigger off the mechanism of the Office of Fair Trading if he believes that a restraint on trade is in operation. I hope that he will reply to that point. Again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewisham, East on initiating the debate and on the way in which he did so.

2.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I echo the sentiments of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) in welcoming this debate introduced by my motor insurance in respect of vehicles registered in the United Kingdom must comply with the requirements of the road traffic legislation.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any restrictions are placed on the movement of funds between the various members of the Common Market and the United Kingdom which would affect the payment of insurance claims taken up by United Kingdom residents with Common Market insurance companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I am unaware of any restrictions imposed by other member states on the movement of funds that would prevent a United Kingdom resident successfully pursuing a claim against an insurance company established in another member state.

Companies Acts (Consolidation)

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the measures to consolidate the Companies Acts will take effect; and, in the light of the consolidation, which statutory instruments he proposes to remake.

Mr. Fletcher: The consolidation of the Companies Acts is due to come into effect on 1 April as proposed in the Bills currently before the House of Lords. However, the Government consider that users should be given a longer period to familiarise themselves with the new legislation before it comes into operation. The Government therefore propose to introduce amendments to all four Bills so that each would take effect on 1 July.

As regards subordinate legislation, the substance of some regulations has been incorporated in the consolidation, some will remain in force unchanged, some will be re-made to reflect the provisions of the legislation in its new form and some will be re-made for the convenience of users. The list of regulations we intend to remake has yet to be finalised but it will include the Forms Regulations, the Companies (Disclosure of Directors Interests) (Exemptions) Regulations, the Stock Exchange (Designation of Nominees) Order, the Unregistered Companies Regulations and the Companies (Disqualification Orders) Order.

The regulations will be re-made to coincide with the entry into force of the new legislation.

TRANSPORT

Departmental Administration

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total cost of administration of his Department, expressed in constant prices, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Ridley: The total cost of administration of the Department of Transport expressed in 1983-84 prices in each of the last five years was:

	£ million
1979-80	258·9
1980-81	259·1
1981-82	244·7
1982-83	220·7
1983-84	256·2

The figures exclude capital in all years. The figure for 1983-84 includes £25·0 million in respect of staff dealing with aviation and shipping transferred from the former Department of Trade on 1 July 1983.

Bypasses (Trees and Shrubs)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to encourage or require local authorities to plant trees and shrubs along bypasses they construct with the aid of central Government funds.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department lays down no requirements of this sort; it must be for local highway authorities to decide on such matters on their roads. But I commend the planting of trees and shrubs and we set a good example on our own roads. My right hon. Friend takes the environmental aspects of schemes into account when considering them for support with transport supplementary grant, and expenditure on planting attracts grant to the extent that it is included in the local authority's estimates accepted by him.

Roads (Expenditure)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the amount of money spent on road maintenance in the last financial year for which statistics are available.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1982-83, the latest year for which out-turn information is available, £1,330·9 million was spent on road maintenance by central and local government throughout the United Kingdom.

Railways (Accident Statistics)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the numbers of fatalities or serious injuries sustained by train passengers known to his Department in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other countries, where goods trains carrying hazardous materials were involved in accidents in railway tunnels for each year since 1960.

Mr. David Mitchell: There have been no fatalities or serious injuries to train passengers from this cause in the United Kingdom since 1960. The Department's main source of information on railway accidents in other countries is the annual report published by the International Union Railways (UIC). These reports do not give the kind of detailed information requested.

Buses

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing the total amounts paid to bus operators in respect of revenue support for the financial years 1974-75 and 1984-85, together with the total bus route mileage and passengers carried for each of the years in respect of each of the shire and metropolitan county councils in England.

Mr. David Mitchell: Bus route mileage figures are not readily available. Figures on vehicle kilometres by stage services and passenger journeys on stage services are available on a national basis for calendar years and are given as follows for 1974 and 1983. Figures on revenue support by county councils for public passenger transport services are available for financial years and are given below for 1974-75 and 1983-84, but these include revenue support for rail and ferry services. In the metropolitan areas expenditure on rail and ferry services accounts for some 20 per cent. of the total support; in the shire counties such expenditure is very small.

Vehicle kilometres by stage services in GB	2,360	*2,125

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received a reply in response to his White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300, from the London Regional Passenger Transport Committee.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many replies he has received in response to his White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300, in favour of and how many were against (a) eliminating cross subsidy, (b) reducing subsidy, (c) reorganising the National Bus Company into smaller units, (d) introducing shared taxis without controls, (e) replacing conventional full size bus services with mini bus services, (f) introducing the requirement that authorities seek competitive tenders for contracts to run bus services and (g) abandoning the controls the number of taxis in metropolitan areas.

Mr. David Mitchell: The White Paper did not propose nor does the Transport Bill provide powers for the elimination of cross-subsidy, the reduction of subsidy, the introduction of shared taxis without controls nor the replacement of conventional full size bus services with minibus services. There was a wide range of responses on the NBC, tendering and taxis proposals but the complex and thoughtful nature of many of the responses makes it impossible to place them in to the simple categories of for and against.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many replies he has received in response to his White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300, from area transport users consultative committees in areas outside London that might be affected; and how many of these were in favour of reducing the subsidy to bus services and how many were opposed;

(2) how many replies he has received in response to his White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300, from area transport users consultative committees in areas outside London that might be affected; and how many of these were in favour of deregulating the bus industry and how many were opposed.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received one response from an area transport users consultative committee broadly in favour of the White Paper proposals. Several area transport users consultative committees have endorsed the response by the joint public transport users group in the six metropolitan counties which was broadly opposed to the policy. The proposals set out in the White Paper are about improving local bus services and getting better value for money, not about changing the level of subsidy available to support the industry.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many replies received in response to his White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300, indicated that the proposals would have an adverse effect by causing (a) reduced services in rural areas, (b) loss of a co-ordinated network, (c) higher fares and cuts in services on less well used or costly routes and at less popular times of the day or week and (d) increased congestion and reduced safety.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received over 8,000 responses many of which contained a mixture of these particular points. The Department has now published a response to the consultation, which addresses these arguments, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Stanley: Any nuclear weapon with the requisite range to reach a given known target could theoretically be used against that target in a first strike, but in practice a first strike by either NATO or the Warsaw Pact would have no prospect of achieving success because each side has an assured retaliatory capability. It cannot be emphasised too strongly that 'first strike' forms no part of NATO policy.

Wintex-Cimex '85 Exercise

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the areas of the northern region that he expects to be used by ground forces during the Wintex '85 exercises; and if he will indicate the flight paths to be used by aircraft involved in the exercises.

Mr. Stanley: Wintex-Cimex '85 is a command post exercise that does not involve the deployment of either ground formations or aircraft.

Departmental Purchases

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a description of the types of articles purchased by or on behalf of his Department from Eastern bloc countries.

Mr. Butler: We are not aware of any systems or sub-systems currently being purchased from Eastern bloc countries, although four Britten Norman aircraft purchased between 1982 and 1984 were assembled in Rumania. At the component level, some limited purchases of materials and parts may occur from time to time, but only in circumstances where no problems of strategic dependence are involved.

Royal Navy Stores

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the measures being taken to open the supply of stores to Royal Navy warships to private competition.

Mr. John Lee: In accordance with Government policy, opportunities are being sought to contract out elements of the naval stores organisation, where that would be to the advantage of the Royal Navy and of the taxpaper.

Brave Defender Exercise

Mr. Dafydd Ellis Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether exercise Brave Defender is part of the annual series of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Autumn Forge exercises.

Mr. Stanley: No.

HMS Starling (Logbook)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the log book of HMS Starling (F66) for the period shortly following the time when Starling was subjected to radiation trials in the Atlantic in 1953 has been withdrawn by his Department from the Public Records Office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The ship's log of HMS Starling for the month of August 1953 was withdrawn from the Public Record Office in order that it might be examined within the Ministry of Defence for the purposes of replying to the hon. Member's prior correspondence on the subject of alleged radiation trials. From this examination of this document it would appear that there are no grounds whatsoever for believing that such trials took place as alleged in the hon. Member's letter. The log has now been returned to the Public Record Office; for the hon. Member's convenience in retrieving it, the reference number is ADM53/136740.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce the terms and conditions of employment of the new head of defence procurement, Mr. Peter Levene.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave some information about the terms and conditions of employment on which Mr. Peter Levene will be appointed as the chief of defence procurement in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) on 19 December 1984 at columns 205-6. Certain other aspects of them are still under discussion, and will write to the hon. Gentleman when they have been finalised.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure

29. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures stating the differential in per capita public expenditure between people living in Wales and the United Kingdom average.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest available figures of identifiable public expenditure in each country of the United Kingdom are for 1982-83. For that year, identifiable per capita expenditure in Wales was £1,726 and the United Kingdom average was £1,612. Figures for 1983-84 will be available shortly.

Economic Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish such figures as he has, comparing in local currencies and in £ sterling equivalent: (a) gross domestic product per person, (b) average income tax paid per person and (c) average value-added tax paid per person in each of the United Kingdom, Germany and France during the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is given below in terms of local currencies and in £ sterling based both on market exchange rates and purchasing power parities. The latest comparable data on income tax and VAT are for 1982 and accordingly GDP per capita figures for that year are as follows. A more recent comparison of GDP per capita of the countries in question using PPP was given in my answer on 22 January 1985 at column 364 to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell).

European Community (Competitiveness)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what change in the overall competitiveness of the United Kingdom economy has occurred as a result of United Kingdom Membership of the EEC.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is impossible to quantify the effects of United Kingdom membership of the European Community on general competitiveness. However, the United Kingdom has benefited from access to the large Community internal market because of the opportunities for greater specialisation and exploitation of comparative advantage which a larger market affords.

European Community (Expenditure)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the annual increases in total EC expenditure since 1970; and what have been the annual increases in own resources since the system was first introduced.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Information prior to 1973 is not readily available. The remainder of the information requested is set out in the table.

The budget figure to which expenditure relates were established in Units of Account (u.a.) before 1978; from 1979 until 1980 they were established in European units of account (EUA). Since these two units were calculated on different bases they are not directly comparable, except in the case of the European development fund for which it was agreed that a conversion rate of 1 u.a. = 1 EUA would be adopted. Community budgets from 1981 have been established in European currency units (ECU), with the agreement that 1 ECU = 1 EUA for the years 1981 and 1982.

As from 1 January 1971 the system of own resources progressively replaced the former system of fixed percentage financial contributions by member states. From 1975 these financial contributions were calculated on the basis of the gross national product (GNP) shares of members states.

In 1979 own resources, for the first time included VAT. This was paid by member states other than the Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland and Luxembourg, which continued to pay GNP-based financial contributions. From 1980 the VAT system was applied by all then member states. Greece joined the Community in 1981 and, on a transitional basis, has paid financial contributions based on GNP.

The information given has been taken from the relevant European Court of Auditors' reports, except in the case of the increase between 1983 and 1984 where, for 1984, Supplementary and amending budget figures have been used.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage total European Economic Community expenditure has increased in each year since 1970.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 336]: I regret that an error was made in the compilation of the table supplied with the original answer. The corrected version is as follows:

The remainder of the information requested is set out in the table. European Community (Economic Comparison)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a comparison between gross domestic product, income tax and value added tax, for each member state of the European Economic Community for the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: Comparisons between gross domestic product, income tax and value added tax for the years 1981 and 1982 for each member of the EC are given, or can be derived from, 'Revenue statistics of OECD Member Countries 1965-1983', published by the OECD. The publication also contains less detailed, provisional figures for 1983 for all the EC countries except Belgium and Italy. Corresponding data for income tax and value added tax are not yet available for 1984 but some broad comparisons of gross domestic product on a per capita basis, based on OECD provisional estimates, were contained in the answer given to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 22 January at column 364.

A copy of the publication is available in the House of Commons Library.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the effect on the exchange rate against (a) the United States dollar (b) other currencies and (c) overall after three years of his simulation on the Treasury model of the effect of a reduction in real wages on employment; and if he will publish in the Offical Report a table showing what is the effect on employment of such a change in the absence of a reduction in real wages but assuming an accommodating monetary policy.

Mr. Peter Rees: The effect on the sterling index in simulations of lower real wages under various assumptions about fiscal and monetary policy is shown in tables A to D of annex B of the recent paper by Treasury officials on "The Relationship between Employment and Wages". The simulations assume implicitly that the proportionate changes in sterling are the same against all currencies. It would be misleading to consider the effects of changes in the exchange rate on output and employment in isolation from the factors which brought the change about.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury model of the economy incorporates the findings in Treasury Working paper no. 2 by Messrs Odling-Smee and Hartly concerning the effect of exchange rate changes; and if he will publish in the Official Report a statement showing how the predicted changes since 1980 have been realised in practice.

Mr. Peter Rees: The effects of exchange rate changes in the current version of the Treasury model differ from those reported in Treasury working paper No. 2. The most recent results of simulations of the effect of an exchange rate change were published in HM Treasury Macroeconomic Model Technical Manual Supplement 1984 (J. Barber ed.). Results of simulation cannot be compared to outturn: those factors assumed fixed in simulation will in practice vary.

Wage and Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the significant changes in command to the Treasury model used in his simulation of the relationship between real wages and employment.

Mr. Peter Rees: The version of the model which was used to produce these simulations is described in annex B of the recent paper by Treasury officials entitled "The Relationship between Employment and Wages". Apart from the wages sector, the model has been used without adjustment.

Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total cost of the administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The total cost of administration of the Treasury expressed in 1983-84 prices was £70·3 million in 1981-82, £70·4 million in 1982-83, and £68·3 million in 1983-84. This information is taken from the last annual scrutiny of Departmental running costs. Comparable figures for earlier years are not available because of machinery of government changes.

Civil Service

Mr. Key asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of overtime payments for each Department or Ministry in the Home Civil Service in each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information requested is not available centrally for 1979-80 and 1980-81. The table shows the provision sought in Supply Estimates for the period 1981-82 to 1984-85.

Mr. Key asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff have been and are employed by each Department or Ministry of the home Civil Service on a short-term contract for each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information requested is not held centrally; and could only be drawn together at disproportionate cost.

Customs and Excise (Drug Seizures)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much cannabis was seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers in each of the past three years; what was the value for each year; and what is the percentage increase in the current year over the previous year;

(2) how much cocaine was seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers in each of the past three years; what was the value for each year; and what is the percentage increase in the current year over the previous year;

(3) how much heroin was seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers in each of the past three years; what was the value for each year; and what is the percentage increase in the current year over the previous year.

Mr. Hayhoe: The quantities and estimated street value of cannabis, cocaine and heroin seized in each of the past three years and the percentage increase by weight over the previous year are set out in the following table. The figures for 1984 are provisional.

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total value of drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the past three years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The total estimated street value of drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the past three years is as follows:

	£ million
1982	57
1983	70
1984	102

Customs and Excise (Establishment)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the establishment of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers in England and Wales during each of the last three years; and what is the forecast for 1984-85.

Mr. Hayhoe: The establishment of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers in England and Wales during each of the last three years and the estimated figure for 1984-85 is given in staff in post terms at 31 March.

Drug Smuggling

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Government are taking to limit drug smuggling in Great Britain.

Mr. Hayhoe: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced last October, the 60 additional posts allocated to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for 1984-85 to enhance levels of preventive control on passengers and freight have been made permanent and a further 100 new posts have been allocated for 1985-86 specifically for prevention of drug smuggling. In addition a customs officer has been posted to Pakistan and a police officer to the Netherlands to liaise closely with the law enforcement agencies in those countries and feed back intelligence on drug trafficking activities.

Taxation and National Insurance Contributions

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, pursuant to his answer given on 20 December 1984, Official Report, column 325, he will provide the same information on the breakdown of taxation and national insurance contributions as a percentage of gross domestic product for 1960-61, 1964-65, 1970-71, 1974-75 and 1978-79, respectively.

Mr. Moore: The information is in the following table. Figures for earlier years on a consistent basis are not available.

Tax Revenue

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to his answer given on 11 January, Official Report, column 563, he will publish in the Official Report the total estimated tax revenue for 1984-85 broken down into the headings used in his earlier reply and show this as a proportion of gross domestic product at market prices.

Mr. Moore: The information is in the table.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effect on revenue in 1984-85 of the decisions made in Budgets from 1982 onwards to raise higher tax bands over and above the rate of inflation.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of revenue forgone in respect of mortgage interest tax relief on second or subsequent loans over and above those used for the first purchase of a house.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

"Nationalised Industries Legislation"

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many copies of the consultative proposals, "Nationalised Industries Legislation", were (a) printed, (b) circulated on 20 December 1984 and (c) circulated since;

(2) at what time of day on Thursday 20 December 1984 the document, "Nationalised Industries Legislation", was deposited in (a) the Library and (b) the Press Gallery, respectively;

(3) what Ministers in his Department have made statements and speeches since Thursday 20 December 1984 where reference has been made to his consultative proposals, "Nationalised Industries Legislation";

(4) if he will make a statement on the scope and scale of distribution of his consultative proposals, "Nationalised Industries Legislation";

(5) if he will extend the deadline of the end of February for receipt of comments on his consultative proposals, "Nationlised Industries Legislation";

(6) how many comments have so far been received on the consultative proposals "Nationalised Industries Legislation";

(7) why no press notice was published on 20 December 1984 drawing attention to his consultative proposals, "Nationalised Industries Legislation".

Mr. Peter Rees: Following earlier discussions with the nationlised industry chairman, a consultation note was issued on 20 December and has been made freelt available to all who have requested it. Copies are availble from a number of sources and because the note is not copyright it is not possible to say how many copies are in circulation. The note was placed in the Library of the House at 3.30 pm on 20 December following an answer given by me that day to a parliamentary question put down by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle Upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) at column 326. Simultaneously, 70 copies of the note were placed in the Lower Press Gallery and additional copies were sent direct to a number of national newspapers. In view of these arrangements it was not thought necessary to issue a formal press notice. I am not aware of any reference to the consultation note in formal statements on speeches made by Treasury Ministers since 20 December.

No formal comments have yet been received by the Treasury on the note but I understand that a number of discussions are taking place between sponsor Departments and nationalised industries. The consultative note sets a deadline of end-February for comments on the principles underlying the legislative proposals and I have no plans generally to extend this. I am of course willing to consider comments thereafter on the detail of any legislation we may introduce.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in net take-home pay or benefit since 1979 of a married man with two children aged under 10 years who is (a) employed and in the lowest 10 per cent. of wage-earners and (b) unemployed and in receipt of supplementary and other benefits.

Mr. Moore: [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 160]: the position for a married man with two children aged 4 and 6, whose earnings were equal to the estimated lowest decile of earnings for full-time males (all occupations), paid at adult rates, is as follows:

In April 1979, he would have had take home pay of £49·10 per week after tax and NIC and, in addition, would have received child benefit of £8·00. He would also have been entitled to benefits-in-kind (free school meals) of £1·25 and, had he lived in Local Authority accommodation with typical rent and rates of £10·10 per week (including water rates), he would have been entitled to £2·09 in rent and rate rebates.

In April 1984, his weekly take home pay would have been £78·59 after tax and NIC, his child benefit £13·00 and, with typical Local Authority rent and rates of £22·75 per week, he would have been entitled to £10·22 in rebates. He may also have been entitled to benefits-in-kind (free school meals and welfare milk) of £2·60 per week.

A man in similar circumstances but unemployed and receiving supplementary benefit, would have received, in April 1979, in addition to child benefit of £8·00, benefits in cash or kind totalling £39·25 per week. This would have included full allowance for rent and rates.

In April 1984, an unemployed man getting supplementary benefit would hve received child benefit of £13·00 and other benefits in cash or kind totalling £77·67 per week. This would have included full rent and rate rebates.

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the value to (a) a married man on national average earnings with two children aged 5 and 11 years, (b) a married man with the same family on two-thirds national average earnings and (c) a married man with the same family on five times national average earnings, from the expenditure of £2 million to either (i) increase child benefit or (ii) raise tax thresholds.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 7 February 1985, c. 675-76]: The increases in tax thresholds or child benefit which could be obtained at a cost of £2 million are very small. I assume that the hon. Member intended to specify a cost of £2 billion. The information in the table (for a married man with two children) therefore assumes an increase in expenditure or reduction in revenue of £2 billion in a full year.

£ per week	£ per week	£ per week
Multiple of average earnings	Increase in child benefit*	Reduction in income tax

5	6·20	3·69

* Assuming similar increases in the supplementary benefit ordinary scale rates for dependent children.

Income Tax and National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is estimated to be the revenue likely to be raised in the current financial year from the lowest 10 per cent. of wage-earners (a) in income tax and (b) in national insurance contributions.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 160]: The normal definition of the lowest 10 per cent. of earners relates to full time employees on adult rates only. I regret that the income tax and national insurance contributions paid by these people cannot be distinguished, in tax records, from those paid by part-time employees or juveniles with the same earnings levels, who would not be confined to those in the lowest 10 per cent. of the earnings distribution appropriate to them.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of abolishing capital gains tax on (a) assets held before 1979 and (b) held for more than two years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 7 February 1985, c. 674]: I regret that precise estimates cannot be made but a very large proportion of the yield of capital gains tax would be lost—probably about three-quarters of it for (a) and even more for (b).

Taxation

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the total amount of revenue accruing to the Exchequer from (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (d) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate in each year since 1979 in real terms, calculated at (i) 1979 prices and (ii) 1984 prices;

(2) what is the total amount of revenue expected to accrue to the Exchequer from (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (d) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate in the years 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. John Moore [pursuant to his replies, 7 February 1985, c. 673]: The information in respect of years up to 1984-85, for total income tax, capital gains tax and capital transfer tax receipts, is as shown. The figures have been converted to constant prices using the GDP deflator.

† Estimated.

Revised estimate of tax receipts for 1984-85 and a forecast for 1985-86 will be published in the Financial Statement and Budget Report on 19 March.

It is not possible to distinguish receipts of investment income surcharge and tax in excess of the basic rate. The estimated percentage breakdown for each year on the basis of tax liabilities in respect of income in each year is as follows:

Percentages of income tax liabilities

	Tax at basic rate	*Tax in excess of the basic rate	Investment income surcharge
1978-79	94·8	4·0	1·2

1984-85	95·3	4·7	—

* Excluding investment income surcharge.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Hill Farmers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on the purpose of compensatory allowances paid to hill farmers for sheep and cattle;

(2) if he will estimate the effect of abolishing compensatory allowances paid to hill farmers for sheep and cattle.

Mr. MacGregor: These allowances are paid in accordance with the European Community Directive on Less Favoured Areas to help ensure the continuation of farming in those areas. Their abolition would substantially reduce net income on hill livestock farms.

Lupin Grain

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which products compete with lupin grain as an animal feed; how much of these products are imported into the United Kingdom and the rest of the European Economic Community from third countries; and how the total subsidy to farmers and processors per tonne of feed product compares to the landed price before duty, levies, and so on on the competing products from third countries.

Mr. MacGregor: The principal competitors with minor products such as lupins for inclusion in compound feed are Community-produced cereals, soyameal and maize gluten feed. In 1983 Community imports of soyameal and maize gluten feed, which enter free of levies and duties, were 9·8 and 3·6 million tonnes respectively, of which the United Kingdom imported 0·8 and 0·4 million tonnes respectively. Direct price comparisons are difficult particularly because of different protein contents. In December 1984, however, the aid payable on lupins incorporated into animal feeds was £93·2 per tonne, the import price of soyameal is £169·1 per tonne and of maize gluten feed £109·2 per tonne.

Sugar

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report, a table showing the proportion of sugar consumed in the United Kingdom that is derived from imported cane sugar and home-grown sugar beet, respectively, for each of the past 10 years.

Mr. MacGregor: United Kingdom sugar production from imported cane raws and from home-grown sugar beet as percentages of domestic consumption have been as follows:

(Oct/Sept)	Cane raws per cent.	Sugar beet per cent.
1974-75	58	23
1975-76	56	28
1976-77	55	29
1977-78	52	39
1978-79	50	44
1979-80	50	45
1980-81	45	55
1981-82	49	48
1982-83	48	50
1983-84	52	51

Note: The percentages do not add up to 100 per cent. because of exports and other sugar imports.

Goats' Milk

Mr. Pawsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will detail those regulations covering the sale of goats' milk together with the dates that they took effect; and if he has any intention to relax those regulations.

Mr. Jopling: There are no specific regulations governing the production and sale of goats' milk. However, goats' milk is subject to the general provisions of the Food Act 1984 which, among other requirements, specifies that all food (including drink) should be of the nature, substance and quality demanded by the purchaser, that it should not be labelled in a false or misleading way, and that it should be fit for human consumption.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the amount of goats' milk produced each year for the last 10 years.

Mr. Jopling: No figures on the production of goats' milk are collected by my Department. However, it is estimated that milk production by goats on agricultural holdings in the United Kingdom amounted to about 19 million litres in 1983 having nearly doubled from about 11 million litres in 1975, the only other recent year for which a corresponding estimate is available.

EC Expenditure

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each year since 1972 the percentage increases in European Economic Community prices for (a) cereals, (b) rye, (c) rice, (d) sugar, (e) milk, (f) butter, (g) fruit and vegetables, (h) beef, (i) sheepmeat and (j) wine, and the percentage increase in total EEC agricultural expenditure in (i) the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund guarantee section, (ii) the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund guidance section and (iii) overall terms.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is given as follows. In the case of cereals and fruit and vegetables price changes are given for individual products:

Conservation

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to introduce a national scheme of support for farmers in evironmentally sensitive areas if he is unsuccessful in persuading his European colleagues to amend the proposed agricultural structures regulation, COM (83) 559, in favour of conservation.

Mr. Jopling: I am still hopeful of persuading other member states of the Community of the prudence of strengthening the conservation provisions of the EC Commission's draft regulation on agricultural structures. If I do not succeed I shall have to consider what other action would be appropriate.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that the proposed regulation on agricultural structures, COM (83) 559, will represent a fair balance between conservation and agriculture if the United Kingdom's draft amendments to the regulation are not fully accepted by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: I have already stated on a number of occasions that I do not believe that the EC Commission's proposed regulation on agricultural structures pays sufficient regard to conservation, which is why I have proposed certain amendments to it.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be able to announce new supports for farmers in environmentally sensitive areas permitted under the proposed agricultural structures regulation, COM (83) 559; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The EC Commission's proposed regulation on agricultural structures is still being negotiated. I hope that the negotiations will be concluded soon but until they are I am not able to announce my intentions with regard to any of the provisions in the regulation.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he has proposed in the course of the current negotiations on the agricultural structures regulation, COM (83) 559, that an additional clause be added to the regulation empowering member states to withhold grant aid to farmers on the grounds that works may be harmful to the environment.

Mr. Jopling: The amendment in question was one of a series of amendments I proposed to the commission's draft regulation on agricultural structures which were designed to strengthen its conservation provisions.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any member state of the European Community has introduced under its national legislation a scheme of assistance to farmers in environmentally sensitive areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The concept of defining certain areas as environmentally sensitive is mine and I am not aware that this particular approach is used elsewhere in the Community.

SOCIAL SERVICES

EC (Poverty Definition)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 17 January, Official Report, column 219, if the European Economic Community definition of poverty is accepted by Her Majesty's Government as a definition for use in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Whitney: The European Economic Community's form of words quoted in my reply of 17 January 1985 at column 219, was accepted solely for the purposes of the European Community programme to combat poverty. In this country we have no generally accepted definition of poverty.

Acute Beds

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many acute beds there are within the National Health Service in London; and what has been the level of demand for them in each year since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is set out in the table which shows that while beds have reduced by 3·5 per cent. in-patient cases have increased by 4·6 per cent.—a net increase in cases treated per bed of 8·4 per cent.

*NHS hospitals in health authorities wholly or partly within the GLC area—Acute specialties

Year	Average daily number of available beds	In-patient cases
1980	29,543	872,408
1981	29,262	883,132
1982	28,995	884,999
1983	28,510	912,945

* "Acute" is defined as all specialties except geriatrics, younger disabled, GP maternity, obstetrics, mental handicap and mental illness.

Health Authorities (Appointees)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he observes when appointing medical members of regional health authorities and district health authorities; how many appointees for each year since 1980 have been in receipt of merit or distinction awards when appointed; how many were women; how many were from ethnic groups; and what was the total number appointed in each year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We take a wide variety of factors into account when considering all appointments to regional health authorities, including the candidates' personal qualities, their interest in and commitment to the National Health Service and their management or other relevant experience. The other information requested is not readily available and could be collated only at disproportionate cost. My right hon. Friend does not appoint members of district health authorities.

Steroids

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to require that creams and other preparations containing steroids for use in the treatment of eczema are clearly labelled as containing steroids and should carry instructions for use and guidance as to possible side-effects.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not think such action is necessary. Existing regulations under the Medicines Act provide that dispensed medicinal products must be labelled with directions and precautions as requested by the prescriber. Comprehensive advice for prescribers about the application of external steroid preparations is already contained in the appropriate product data sheets that are supplied to all doctors and in prescribing aids such as the British National Formulary. In addition the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain recommends that pharmacists, in the absence of instructions from the prescriber, label external steroid preparations with the words "To be applied sparingly".

Post Neonatal Mortality

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what complaints have been sent to him in response to his Department's publication entitled, "A Multi-centre Study of Post Neonatal Mortality".

Mr. John Patten: None.

Board and Lodging

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will meet Shelter, the Campaign for the Single Homeless, the Child Poverty Action Group, the Disability Alliance and the Central London Social Security Advisers' Forum about his plan for new regulations governing allocation of social security payments for board and lodging to claimants under the age of 18 years.

Mr. Newton: I have already agreed to a request from these bodies for a discussion with me.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he proposed to have with the National Association of Probation Officers about his proposals to reduce ceilings on board and lodging charges, to refuse benefit payments to 16 and 17-year-olds except in exceptional circumstances and to reduce the allowances of claimants who move to live out of their normal area after two to four weeks.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a copy of representations made to the Social Security Advisory Committee by the National Association of Probation Officers. These will be taken into account, along with all the other representations received, when we are considering the comments of the Social Security Advisory Committee on our proposals.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what investigations he intends to conduct into rents charged by private landlords in relation to the level of earnings of claimants of board and lodgings payments;

(2) what assessments he intends to make in respect of availability of boarding accommodation to claimants of board and lodgings payments within his Department's individual office areas.

Mr. Whitney: More information about the operation of the market in board and lodging accommodation would, in our opinion, be valuable, and both this Department and the Department of the Environment are seeking ways of improving the information available.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies he made of the effects which his proposals to limit the timespan to two to four weeks prior to the reduction of benefit to claimants could have on lodging schemes administered by the probation service for the placement of ex-offenders.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member is referring to our proposals to reform the arrangements for making board and lodging payments under the supplementary benefit scheme. The effects of our proposals on particular groups of claimants are among the matters we shall be considering in framing our response to the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee.

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the individuals and organisations who have submitted evidence to the Social Security Advisory Committee in response to its inquiry into the proposed changes in board and lodging regulations for supplementary benefit claimants.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that a list of the individuals and organisations who have submitted evidence to the Social Security Advisory Committee on this subject will be published as an appendix to their report to my right hon. Friend on the proposed changes. The report will be laid before the house when draft regulations are laid. In the meantime, I have placed a list of those submitting evidence in the Library.

Benefits (Overpayments)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants of unemployment or supplementary benefit have been instructed by his Department to return overpaid allocations in each single year since 1979; what proportion of such claimants were registered as blind or disabled; and what proportion of such benefits extended back over a time-span of (a) two years, (b) three or four years, (c) five or six years and (d) for longer than six years.

Mr. Newton: I regret that this information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many deaths have occurred arising from acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the United Kingdom in 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1984, there were 30 deaths in the United Kingdom from acquired immune deficiency syndrome fulfilling the criteria for the case definition compiled by centres for disease control for the purposes of epidemiological surveillance.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received asking him to take early steps to make acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None.

Benefits

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion supplementary benefit for a childless married couple is of supplementary benefit for a single person; what proportion supplementary benefit plus child benefit for a married couple with two children under the age of 11 years is of supplementary benefit for a single person; and how these proportions have changed since 1966.

Mr. Whitney: The information is as follows:

Supplementary benefit plus, where there are children, child benefit as a proportion of the ordinary scale rate for a single householder.*

	November 1966 (per cent.)	November 1984 (per cent.)
Couple	164	162
Couple with two children†
i. both aged under 5	222	231
ii. both aged 5-10	233	231
iii. one age under 5 and one aged 5-10	228	231

Notes:

* Child benefit is taken fully into account as income when calculating a claimant's entitlement to supplementary benefit.

† In 1966 there were two separate scale rates for children under 5 and children aged 5 to 10; from 1980 there was one rate for children under 11.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest information for the west midlands and for Great Britain as a whole on the number of claims for national insurance benefits, broken down into each available benefit, in which it is discovered that an employer has failed to deduct national insurance contributions from an employee's wages, showing (a) the proportion and number of these cases in which the claim was refused and (b) the proportion and number in which the claim was allowed only at a reduced rate;

(2) if he will give the latest information for the west midlands and for Great Britain as a whole on the number of claimants for national insurance benefits, in which it is discovered that an employer has deducted national insurance contributions from an employee's wages but failed to pass them on, showing (a) the proportion and number of these cases in which the claim was refused and (b) the proportion and number in which the claim was allowed only at a reduced rate;

(3) if he will give the latest available figures for the west midlands and for Great Britain as a whole, for the number of cases referred to him under regulation 39 of the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 1979, under which he may exercise his discretion and allow a national insurance benefit to be paid where a claimant's contribution record is deficient for these reasons; and if he will give corresponding figures for the number of national insurance benefit payments so allowed giving a breakdown by benefit, amounts involved and by the value of contribution deficiencies.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Health Authorities (General Managers)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his guidance to health authorities on the appointment of general managers distinguishes between the previous administrative function and the new management function.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our guidance lists the fundamental characteristics of the general management function which are clearly much wider than the previous administrative function.

Winterton General Practice Partnership South Humberside

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the income from dispensing National Health Service prescriptions of the Winterton general practice partnership in south Humberside.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Financial information relating to individual doctors or practices is confidential.

Doctors (Consultation Times)

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time that a National Health Service general practitioner spends with each patient; and what were the figures for the average time spent in the previous five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will invite a member of the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee to join his expert advisers on the preparation of a limited list of drugs; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will invite a member of the Royal College of Nursing to join his expert advisers on the preparation of a limited list of drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The experts from the medical and pharmaceutical professions who are advising the Chief Medical Officer on the content of the limited list have virtually completed their work. There is no need to invite anyone else to join them at this stage. One of the experts, Mr. David Coleman, is vice-chairman of the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee. That committee and members of the Royal College of Nursing have also given valuable advice which is being considered by our experts.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether, as a result of his consultations, he intends to include the drug Brufen in his limited list proposals;

(2) whether, as a result of his consultations, he intends to include Tagamet or Indocid suppositories in his limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Brufen, Tagamet and Indocid were never in the categories of drugs affected by our limited list proposals.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to over-rule local drug and therapeutic committees where hospital formularies differ from his proposals for a limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities will be asked to apply to the hospital service the limitations being introduced to the range of drugs prescribable in the family practitioner services. The precise arrangements have yet to be determined.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish the regulations under the Social Security Act 1984 relating to formal links between family practitioner committees and community health councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We intend to publish new Community Health Council Regulations during March to provide for the formal link between community health councils (CHCs) and the new family practitioner committees (FPCs) with effect from 1 April 1985.

The regulations will be made under the National Health Service Act 1977 as amended by the Health and Social Security Act 1984 and will introduce a duty on:

i. CHCs to advise FPCs on appropriate matters relating to the operation of the Health Service;
ii. FPCs to consult CHCs on proposals for substantial developments of, or variations in, services;
iii. FPCs to provide CHCs with such information about the planning and operation of services as CHCs reasonably require to carry out their duties; and
iv. an FPC to provide a separate response to those parts of a CHC's annual report that concern the FPC.

The regulations will also update and consolidate extant CHC Regulations and introduce a provision to dismiss a CHC member for misconduct.

Nursing Staff (Back Injuries)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate, on an annual basis, the number of nursing staff in the National Health Service who experience and suffer from back injury, and the number of working days lost through back injury; if back injury in the nursing profession is greater than among the rest of the working population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed information centrally.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will revise the criteria for determining the standard payment for nursing home accommodation;

(2) whether he is satisfied that the existing rate of payment for nursing home care is sufficient to maintain satisfactory standards; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what consultations he has had in relation to rates of payment for registered nursing homes and standards of care within them.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member is referring to payments made under the supplementary benefit scheme to certain people in nursing homes. We put proposals for changing the relevant arrangemens to the Social Security Advisory Committee last year. Over 500 bodies submitted comments on the consultative document, a copy of which is in the Library. We are now considering the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee, which we have just received, and will publish the report and our response when our consideration is complete. So far as standards of care are concerned, we introduced measures to improve control on 1 January after extensive consultation.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nursing homes were deregistered in each of the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 as a result of the inspection process.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested for past years is not available centrally, but a national list of cancelled registrations for nursing homes, residential care homes and voluntary children's homes is being compiled from 1 January 1985.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that the inspection powers in relation to registered nursing homes have sufficient penalties to make them effective; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, we are not aware of any evidence to the contrary.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many state pensioners would be taken out of housing benefit by increasing by £10 per week the state pension.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available.

may be asked to provide receipts for the purchase. We have no present plans to revise these arrangements, but if my hon. Friend has any evidence of abuse I will look into it.

Ketoconazole

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidelines he has issued to doctors about the risks of using the oral drug Ketoconazole weighed against its benefits to patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The chairman of the Committee on Safety of Medicines the body established under the Medicines Act to advise Health Ministers, wrote last month to all doctors in the United Kingdom about reports of liver damage associated with the use of oral Ketoconazole. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library. It advises doctors to weigh the potential benefits of treatment against the risk of liver damage and to monitor their patients carefully both clinically and biochemically. The letter supplements the guidance published by the manufacturer in its data sheet on the product's side effects and contra-indications.

Doctors (Prescriptions)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what checks are made on the quality and quantity of drugs supplied by dispensing doctors against their own prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Because of practical difficulties the drug testing scheme which operates for chemists does not apply to dispensing doctors.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average number of prescriptions per patient issued by prescribing and dispensing doctors respectively; and what is their relative average drug cost per prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983-84 dispensing doctors in England and Wales issued on average 6·7 prescriptions per dispensing patient with an average drug cost of £3·34; prescribing doctors issued on average 7·0 prescriptions with an average drug cost of £3·50.

Prescriptions (Costs)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the saving in the cost of the pharmaceutical service if all prescriptions were dispensed by pharmacist contractors, assuming that all prescriptions now dispensed by doctors were dispensed by average size pharmacies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have the detailed information that would be required to attempt to answer this question. The cost or savings associated with a redistribution of dispensing from dispensing doctors to dispensing pharmacists would depend on the pattern of costs of available dispensing outlets in the localities in question.

Advisory Bodies

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all bodies which advise him in the discharge of his health functions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I would refer the hon. Member to the Cabinet Office (MPO) booklet "Public Bodies 1984", published on 18 December last year, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the supra-regional specialities advisory group.

Mr. John Patten: The supra-regional services advisory group makes recommendations to the Secretary of State on which services are appropriate for supra-regional designation, on which units are appropriate for designation as supra-regional centres for their provision, and on what level of funding is appropriate for allocation to each. Its membership is as follows:

Mr. A. V. Driver (Chairman) — Regional Health Authority; Chairman, South West Thames RHA.
Dr. G. F. Cohen — Consultant physician, representing the Joint Consultants Committee.
Mr. D. P. Eccleshall—Regional Works Officer (Oxford RHA).
Mr. A. H. Grabham — Chairman of the Joint Consultants Committee.
Mr. F. Jackson — Regional Treasurer (North West Thames RHA).
Mr. A. J. Kember—Regional General Manager (South West Thames RHA).
Dr. A. McGregor — Regional Medical Officer (West Midlands RHA).
Miss Z. Oxlade — Regional Nursing Officer (East Anglian RHA).
Professor D. A. Shaw—Dean of Medicine, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (representing medical academic interests).
Sir Geoffrey Slaney—Profession of Surgery representing the Joint Consultants Committee.
Mr. A. C. Taylor—DHA Chairman (Newcastle Health Authority).
Dr. D. Innes Williams—Director, British Postgraduate Medical Federation (representing Special Health Authorities responsible for postgraduate hospitals).

The arrangements for supra-regional funding and the role of the supra-regional services advisory group are set out in Health Notice HN(83)36.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the transplant advisory panel.

Mr. John Patten: The transplant advisory panel advises the Chief Medical Officer on clinical matters related to transplantations, and he takes the chair at its meetings. The membership is as follows:

Mr L D Abrams
Professor J R Anderson CBE
Mr R D Atlay
Mr A D Barnes
Professor P G Bevan
Professor J P Blandy
Dr J B Foster
Dr P Freeling
Dr Gillian C Hanson
Mr B S Jay
Professor W B Jennett
Mr R W G Johnson
Dr Mary G McGeown CBE
Dr Celia M Oakley
Professor J R Salaman
Professor D J Wheatley
Mr D H Wilson

Ambulance Service

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many members of the ambulance service in England and Wales are funded under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. John Patten Ambulance staff are employed by National Health Service authorities to which section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 does not apply.

Doctors (Medical Certificates)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the circumstances in which general practitioners are permitted to charge a fee for providing notes as evidence of illness or infirmity to claimants who are required to produce such evidence by supplementary benefit adjudication officers;

(2) if he will take steps to exempt supplementary benefit claimants from charges imposed by general practitioners for medical certificates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Paragraph 31(1) of the Doctors' terms of service requires a general practitioner to issue to his National Health Service patients free of charge a certificate reasonably required as evidence to support a claim for supplementary benefit. A charge may be made if a general practitioner issues a certificate to a person who is being attended by another doctor, other than a partner, assistant, or other deputy of that doctor, or, is not being treated by, or under the supervision of, a doctor. We see no reason for wider exemption.

Rampton Hospital (Nurses)

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why staff nurses Irene Hollis and Josephine Mason at Rampton hospital have not been re-instated following suspensions on suspicion of theft in November 1984 when the Director of Public Prosecutions has confirmed to the chairman of the Rampton review board that he cannot trace any papers relating to a police prosecution and their police bail expired on 5 December 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The matter has not yet been resolved. The nurses will remain suspended until police inquiries have been concluded and a decision taken on prosecution. It would be improper for me to seek to intervene in or influence those inquiries and that decision.

Specialist Claims Control

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will publish his report of the review into savings achieved by specialist claims control.

Mr. Newton: The report has just been received and we will announce our conclusions in the light of the results when these have been considered.

DHSS Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what statistics his Department has ceased to collect since June 1983.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 227]: Since June 1983 the Department's statistics and research division has stopped collecting the following routine statistics.

Item	Reasons for stopping collection
Hospital and Community health service statistics
Parts of form SH3 giving statistics on the following types of ancillary department in hospitals:
Blood gas analysis
Electrolysis
Electro myography	•
Medical illustration
Medical photography
Plaster room
Skin treatment
Stoma therapy
Parts of form SH9 giving statistics on in patient and out-patient costs incurred under contractual arrangements with institutions outside the National Health Service.	More reliable but less detailed information on expenditure is available separately from the annual accounts of health authorities.
Forms SBH13A and B on legal status of patients on admission to and discharge from mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units.	Similar data could be obtained from the general-purpose Mental Health Enquiry.
Parts of forms SBH112A, B and C giving statistics on various facilities in mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units.	•
Parts of form SBH195 giving statistics on mileage travelled by ambulances.	•
National Health Manpower statistics
From the Medical Manpower Census
i. numbers of general practitioners participating in Hospital Bed Fund arrangements (paragraphs 88-93 of the terms and conditions of service for Doctors and Dentists).	It was decided that the need for these statistics did not justify the cost of collecting them.
ii. numbers and whole-time equivalents of Post-Registration House Officers.	The grade title has been discontinued.
iii. for Senior Registrars, information on whether the individual is in training or has completed training.	It was decided that the need for these statistics did not justify the cost of collecting them.
Local authority personal social services statistics
Tables from form SSDA906 showing the number of children or young persons engaged in intermediate treatment and the number of intermediate treatment staff employed.	These two tables were added to the return in 1981 to monitor for a limited period the planned expansion of intermediate treatment for children. When the form was reviewed it was decided that this purpose had been served and the tables were dropped.

Form SSDA907 on Adoptions.	In order to provide improved statistics on adoptions, both the DHSS return and the derivation of statistics from adoption orders received by the Registrar General were discontinued in favour of a new unit return which is completed in the course of the adoption process and analysed by OPCS.
Parts of form RA5 on Residential Accommodation for the Elderly and Younger Physically Handicapped giving statistics on the date each home was built and the original purpose for which the home was built.	These two items which were of limited value were deleted from the gazetteer in order to incorporate new data requirements without adding to the burden of data collection.
Social Security Statistics
Short term incapacity statistics for periods up to 8 weeks.	Collection ceased following the introduction of statutory sick pay in April 1983. (Statistics were collected in arrears.)
Injury benefit statistics.	As a consequence of the Industrial Injuries Review, Injury benefit was abolished from April 1983 but transitional arrangements lasted until October 1983.

* The Health Services Information Steering Group has recommended that these items should no longer be returned centrally.

General Practitioner (Dispensing)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will introduce amendments to the regulations applying to general practitioner dispensing so as to permit general practitioners to sell medicines that will no longer be available on National Health Services prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985 c. 611]: Prescribing general medical practitioners will not be permitted to sell drugs to their National Health Service patients.

ENVIRONMENT

District Heating Schemes

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is provided by his Department to local authorities seeking information on the implementation of coal-fired district heating schemes.

Sir George Young: Advice on the factors to be taken into account when considering the installation of district heating in new housing, whether or not coal fired was included in the Department's circular 82/71, although we have since freed local authorities from the detailed controls embodied in that circular.

The Building Research Establishment has carried out research on many aspects of district heating, including heat metering, heat distribution, and the opportunities for various refurbishment measures to reduce energy consumption and costs. The establishment gives advice on these aspects; I have placed a list of its relevant publications in the Library.

Departmental Administration

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The total cost of administration of the Department of the Environment—including the Property Services Agency—expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was as follows:

	£ Million
1979-80	693·5
1980-81	692·8
1981-82	653·4
1982-83	641·1
1983-84	641·8

This information is taken from the annual scrutinies of departmental running costs.

Reema Conclad Houses

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding Reema Conclad houses; and whether this category can be added to those covered by the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Gow: I have received correspondence about the mortgagability of Reema Conclad houses from my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and the Department's regional office has received a letter on the same subject from Southampton city council. I am not aware of any reports of defects in Reema Conclad dwellings. There is therefore no basis on which my right hon. Friend could consider designating this type of dwelling under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Urban Aid

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now extend the disregard for expenditure arising from the inner urban aid programme to all local authorities designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 12 November 1984 at column 131.

Lead in Air

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about measures taken to reduce concentrations of lead in dust and air (a) in the central and greater London area and (b) in the west Midlands region, during the last three years.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not aware of any such measures which are specific to these two areas. The Government decided in 1981 that the lead content of petrol should be reduced by over 60 per cent. by the end of this year. This will produce a rapid and substantial reduction in concentrations of lead in air everywhere. The Health and Safety Executive has recently prepared revised guidance for lead works, including more stringent limits on emissions. This will also help to reduce local concentrations. The relationship between concentrations in air and in dust is the subject of continuing research, but reductions in air concentrations are likely to be followed by reductions in dust concentrations.

Wintex-Cimex '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will define the involvement of his Department in Wintex-Cimex '85.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department does not have a major interest in Wintex-Cimex '85 but takes part in the corporate exercise of testing crisis management measures.

Rents

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average percentage rent increase agreed by rent officers in Greater London in each year since 1975; and what was the equivalent figure determined by rent assessment committees.

Sir George Young: The mean percentage changes on re-registrations by rent officers in Greater London in the years 1975 to 1983 appear in table 11.5 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-1983." Figures for the first half of 1984 appear in table 1.14 of "Housing and Construction Statistics," September quarter 1984, part 1 of issue No. 19. All the currently available information about rent assessment committee decisions is in table 11.8 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-1983." Copies of these sources are available in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the guidelines he issues to rent officers.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the replies which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr.

Fraser) on 4 February, at columns 420-421, concerning the nature of the Department's guidance to rent officers and the question of its publication.

UN Decade for Women

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied that his Department has complied with article 63*(b)* of the 1975 world plan of action for the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Yes. A sub-committee of my Department's General Whitley Council has been established to take forward those items in the centrally agreed programme of action on equal opportunities for women, which were recommended for action at the departmental level. We have, in addition, appointed equal opportunities officers to co-ordinate policy in this area generally.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to promote policies designed to challenge those traditional attitudes which Her Majesty's Government state in their response to the United Nations End of Decade for Women's questionnaire are detrimental to women's attainments in local government.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Within the framework of general anti-discriminatory legislation, it is for those involved in local government to combat such discriminatory attitudes and stereotyped assumptions which remain. The Equal Opportunities Commission has advised numerous local authorities on the adoption of equal opportunities' policies.

Housing Courts and Tribunals

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider the case for new housing courts and tribunals.

Mr. Gow: The Select Committee on the Environment recommended in its report on the private rented housing sector — First Report, Session 1981-82 — that the Government should examine in detail the proposals that had been made for the establishment of a housing court. Since then, I have received a number of representations on this subject.

I have given careful consideration to the wide range of evidence and views on the case for a new housing court or tribunal, in consultation with my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. In the Government's view, the examination of the wide and important issues which have been raised can best be carried forward in the context of the full and systematic review of civil justice which the Lord Chancellor announced on 6 February. Accordingly, as the Lord Chancellor's announcement made clear, housing matters will be given specific consideration in this major review. I have written to the Chairman of the Select Committee, in response to the recommendation in the Committee's report, and a copy of my letter has been placed in the Library.

Passports

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there are any restrictions on the right of people with dual Irish and British citizenship to hold passports of both countries simultaneously.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Firearms

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the decline in England and Wales in the last 10 years of section 1 firearm ownership; and if he will give figures.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information on the numbers of section 1 firearm certificates held has only been collected regularly since 1979. The information for each of the years since then is as follows:

Number of firearm certificates on issue in England and Wales as at 31 December

Year	Firearm certificates
1979	169,590
1980	168,047
1981	164,872
1982	162,696
1983	159,804

The figure for 1984 is not yet available, but the decline between 1979 and 1983 was 6 per cent.

Immigrants' Advisory Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the cost incurred by the United Kingdom immigrants' advisory service on translations in each of the last three years for which figures are available and as to how many cases handled by the service required translations in each of the years in question.

Mr. Waddington: None. Expenditure on translations in connection with immigration appeals is a matter for determination by the United Kingdom immigrants' advisory service within the terms of the grant-in-aid given under section 23 of the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if an inquest has now been completed on all those who died in penal establishments in 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The results of the inquest are now available in cases 48 and 57, as listed in reply to the hon. Member's earlier question on 25 January, at columns 534-36, and are as follows:

Cause of death

Case 48 — natural causes: kidney failure
Case 57 — suicide: asphyxia by hanging

Coroners' verdicts in the other nine cases are still awaited.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the ages, sexes, offences, sentences, causes of deaths and prisons of all those who committed suicide in penal establishments in 1983.

BBC (Licence Fee)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in considering the proposal now before him for an increase in the British Broadcasting Corporation's licence fee to £65, he will require details from the British Broadcasting Corporation regarding the amounts spent on damages and on legal costs, both to outside lawyers and in respect of the British Broadcasting Corporation's legal department, incurred in defending and settling libel actions in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No, since the detailed expenditure of the BBC's grant is a matter for the board of governors.

Human Rights

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he will make to the European ministerial conference on human rights to be held in Vienna on 19 March 1985 to increase the effectiveness of the operation of the European Convention on Human Rights in protecting the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals.

Mr. Mellor: The United Kingdom will continue to promote the provisions of the European convention on human rights by working with her partners at the Vienna conference to further the consolidation and universal acceptance of these provisions.

UN Decade for Women

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement about the reply given by the Government to section D of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire;

(2) if he will request the British Broadcasting Corporation and Independent Broadcasting Authority to provide him with the information required by question 2.2 of section D of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to make extra funds available to the Equal Opportunities Commission as a result of additional responsibilities due to the Government's responses to the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Waddington: The statutory duties of the Equal Opportunities Commission are closely linked to the aims of the United Nations Decade for Women. It is for the commission to formulate its programme and allocate its resources within the limits of its grant-in-aid.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss implementing the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Waddington: The objectives of the commission, in pursuance of its statutory duties, are closely aligned with those of the United Nations Decade for Women. I meet the commission as often as necessary to discuss matters of mutual concern.

Mr. James Magis

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 14 January, column 15, whether Mr. James Magis whilst being detained in the United Kingdom under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, asked for his wife or his lawyer to be informed of his circumstances.

Mr. Brittan: No.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 24 January, column 480, whether the French authorities requested that Mr. James Magis should be returned to France; and whether they were advised of the flight on which he returned to France.

Mr. Brittan: There was no request from the French authorities, but they were informed about Mr. Magis' return to France.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 14 January, Official Report, column 15, whether during Mr. James Magis's detention in the United Kingdom, there were communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Austria, France or the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that the Metropolitan police were in touch with the police in Austria, France and the United States of America. However, there was no contact between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of those countries.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his replies of 14 January, Official Report, column 15, and 24 January, Official Report, column 480, what was the country of origin of the passport on which Mr. James Magis was travelling when he was detained in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brittan: Mr. Magis was travelling on a Canadian passport issued in the United States of America.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 24 January, Official Report, column 480, whether his Department informed the Austrian authorities that Mr. James Magis was temporarily detained in the United Kingdom; and whether any request was made by them for his extradition from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brittan: My Department did not inform the Austrian authorities of Mr. Magis' detention. We received no request for his extradition.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 24 January, Official Report, column 480, whether Mr. James Magis, during his detention in the United Kingdom, specifically requested to be allowed to go on to Canada; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that Mr. Magis stated that it had been his intention to travel to Canada, but he made no request during his dentention to be allowed to go there.

Civil Defence

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to which local authorities have established civil defence volunteer organisations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following 20 county councils have established civil defence volunteer organisations:

Berkshire	Lincolnshire
Buckinghamshire	Norfolk
Cumbria	Northumberland
Devon	North Yorkshire
East Sussex	Nottinghamshire
Essex	Oxfordshire
Hereford and Worcester	Somerset
Hertfordshire	Surrey
Humberside	Warwickshire
Kent	Wiltshire

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those local authorities which have agreed to provide emergency control centres as required under the civil defence regulations; and what expenditure has been allocated for each local authority for this purpose.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Comprehensive information regarding local authority provision is not available; but no local authority in England and Wales has refused to provide an emergency centre. Grant-aid at the rate of 75 per cent. is available for adaptation of existing premises and the provision of essential emergency equipment. Each application is considered on its merits, but in present circumstances approvals are likely to be limited to schemes costing not more than £30,000.

Immigration

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average waiting time prior to gaining permanent admission to the United Kingdom for applicants from the Indian subcontinent in 1979 and each subsequent year for which figures are available; to what he attributes the changes in the time over that period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The waiting times shown in the published information to which I referred in my reply to my hon. Friend on 6 February, at columns 575-76, reflect the number of new applications received, the resources available for interviewing applicants and the queueing arrangements for the different categories of applicant. Many applicants are put in a priority queue and attend their first interview much sooner than those in the main queue.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) murderers of police and prison officers, (b) sexual or sadistic murderers of children and (c) people who have committed murder by shooting in the furtherance of theft were in prison on the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 374]: Central records are held in such a way that the relevant cases cannot be readily identified and provision of the figures specified would be time-consuming and costly. The figure has nevertheless been compiled for those sentenced for the murder in England and Wales of a police or prison officer, of which there were 17 in prison department establishments in England and Wales on 31 December 1984; none of these was serving sentence for the murder of a prison officer.

WALES

Tourism

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the amounts of financial assistance to tourist development in Wales for each of the past 10 years under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The expenditure by the Welsh Tourist Board was as follows:

1974-75	428,000
1975-76	626,000
1976-77	843,000
1977-78	790,000
1978-79	1,618,628
1979-80	1,696,000
1980-81	1,696,000
1981-82	1,911,000

1982-83	1,515,000
1984-85	1,800,000

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the capital and current expenditure of each local authority in Wales on tourism and tourist-related projects for the latest year for which figures are available in cash and per-capita terms.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Local authority financial returns submitted to our Department do not separately identify expenditure on tourism and tourist-related projects. However, details of revenue expenditure on certain relevant services, including tourism promotion, leisure centres, cultural facilities and country parks, are available for all local authorities in "Leisure and Recreation Statistics," published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. In addition, authorities' annual reports may identify expenditure on specific tourist-related services and projects.

Farmers (Capital Grants)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many complaints his Department has received over the past three months about delays with the payments of capital grants to farmers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Thirty-two written complaints have been received.

New College, Cardiff

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been received for grants from his Department for New College, Cardiff; what amounts of grants he has sanctioned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to him on 13 December 1984, at column 549, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

ENERGY

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much money has been allocated by his Department for (a) combined heat and power pilot projects and (b) solar and wind power pilot projects in the last three years.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department's R, D & D expenditure on combined heat and power/district heating, solar and wind energy in the last three years was as follows:

	£ million 1981-82	£ million 1982-83	£ million 1983-84
CHP/DH	0·64	0·48	0·14
Solar	0·7	1·4	0·9
Wind Energy	0·9	2·5	2·5

In addition, my right hon. Friend announced on 25 January, at column 547, commitment of a further £750,000 in grant aid to combined heat and power consortia. This is likely to be taken up in the next two years.

Gas and Electricity Industries

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the impact on prices for domestic consumers of gas and electricity is taken into account by Her Majesty's Government when fixing financial targets and external financing limits for those industries.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Decisions on electricity and gas prices are a matter for the industries. Consequences for pricing are taken into account along with other relevant factors in agreeing financial targets and external financing limits.

Gas

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will publish his estimate of the anticipated cost of gas which is expected to be produced from future exploitation of offshore oilfields.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Production costs for associated gas from offshore oilfields vary widely between different developments depending upon factors such as flow rates, gas-oil ratios, transportation modes and requirements for gas processing or reinjection. It is not therefore possible to give a meaningful estimate.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if it is his intention to ensure that all gas from United Kingdom fields will be landed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Government see no reason at present for changing the requirement that gas produced from the United Kingdom continental shelf should be landed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of gas demand by the year 2,000.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My Department's latest projections of gas demand are given in its proof of evidence for the Sizewell B public inquiry, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy in which year he expects the United Kingdom will cease to obtain sufficient natural gas from its own resources to meet home demand.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Production of natural gas from the United Kingdom continental shelf has never been sufficient to meet home demand fully, particularly since the import of Norwegian Frigg gas started in 1977.

I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's statement on Monday 11 February at column 23.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the estimated United Kingdom gas requirement he expects to be provided from United Kingdom reserves in five, 10 and 15 years time.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The results of recent record levels of exploration and appraisal activity indicate that the United Kingdom should be able to supply a substantial majority of its requirements for gas in the 1990s from United Kingdom reserves.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what European regional development fund non-quota aid payments have been made in the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Trippier: The last month for which statistics are available was December 1984, during which the Department of Trade and Industry made payments under the non-quota section of the European regional development fund totalling £8,848.36 to small firms in eligible steel and shipbuilding areas in England.

Pit Closure Areas (Employment)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he intends to make for the purpose of providing alternative sources of industrial employment in regions affected by the coal pit closures proposed by the National Coal Board.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to the reply, 8 February 1985, c. 747]: The location of any pit closures that may occur is a matter for the National Coal Board. Furthermore, the NCB has repeatedly said that there will be no compulsory redundancies during the current restructuring. The particular problems which may face areas affected by colliery closures are recognised by both the Government and the National Coal Board. The Government therefore welcomed the establishment by the board of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd to support and initiate job creation efforts in coal industry areas where unemployment is already substantial.

In addition, there is available the wide range of special employment and training measures operated by the Manpower Services Commission and, according to the area concerned, regional or national schemes to encourage new or extended industrial investment and thus more jobs.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Eritrea

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Ethiopian Government to ensure that relief supplies destined for Eritrea are not impeded from reaching there.

Mr. Raison: We are in regular contact with the Ethiopian authorities about the relief operations, and will continue to urge them to ensure that relief supplies reach victims of the famine in all areas, including Eritrea.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the overseas aid from (a) the British Government and (b) the European Community is being directed to Eritrea.

Mr. Raison: The relief aid being provided by the Government and the European Community to help victims of the famine in Ethiopia is not specifically directed to particular provinces, but is intended to help victims of the drought in Ethiopia wherever they may be.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Terrorists (Evidence)

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many people have been charged on the basis of converted terrorists' evidence; and in how many cases this is the only evidence upon which the person stands accused.

Mr. Scott: I have been asked to reply, on the assumption that this question relates only to Northern Ireland.

A record of the number of persons charged in Northern Ireland wholly or partially on the basis of evidence given by an alleged accomplice witness was not maintained before 1982. Since then, 593 persons have been so charged in Northern Ireland. The remainder of the information sought is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Wheathampstead

Q18. Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to the parish of Wheathampstead.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Teachers (Scotland)

Q36. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the negotiations on teachers' pay in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has responded positively to the teachers' request for a review of pay by proposing that both pay and conditions of service should be looked at by the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education. I understand that, at a meeting of the SJNC on 7 February, the management side outlined proposals for following up my right hon. Friend's suggestion. I very much hope that Scottish teachers will now agree to take this way forward and will call off their damaging and pointless industrial action.

UN Decade for Women

Q109. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister what measures have been taken by her to implement articles 82, 83 and 86 of the 1975 world plan of action for the United Nations Decade for Women; and if she will appoint a Minister to co-ordinate inter-departmental initiatives and to implement a legislative programme in accordance with the United Nations convention on the eradication of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister whether she will appoint a Cabinet Minister to co-ordinate inter-departmental initiatives in improving the status of women and implementing a legislative programme in accordance with the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

The Prime Minister: The Government have made it clear that the education service should provide genuinely equal opportunities for boys and girls. The educational provisions of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 have played a significant part in encouraging schools and teachers to offer such equal opportunities. The detail of teaching materials and approaches are, however, for local determination.

I do not intend to appoint a Minister to co-ordinate initiatives. The Home Secretary has general responsibility for equal opportunities, but it is right that, if action is needed in any area, it should be carried out by the Minister with the relevant departmental responsibility.

Engagements

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 12 February.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Radiation (Experiments)

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister whether experiments were carried out to assess the effects of radiation using humans at Harwell and elsewhere during the 1940s and 1950s.

The Prime Minister: Medical investigations into the beneficial effects of ionising radiations involving humans have been carried out since the early 1920s. No experiments to assess the adverse effects of ionising radiation using humans were conducted at Harwell during the 1940s and 1950s, and I have no reason to believe that such experiments were conducted under United Kingdom auspices elsewhere.

Sterling

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what criteria Her Majesty's Government use in deciding whether the pound sterling is overvalued in relation to other currencies.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point. It is the dollar that is overvalued in relation to other currencies, as the United States current account payments deficit of over $100 billion would suggest.

Inflation (Definition)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's definition of inflation.

The Prime Minister: A persistent rise in the general level of prices.

Museums and Galleries Commission (Chairman)

Mr. Faulds asked the Prime Minister what consultations Her Majesty's Government are having about the appointment of a chairman of the Museums and Galleries Commission.

The Prime Minister: The consultations are confidential.

Student Awards

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Prime Minister what is her latest estimate of the United Kingdom price cost in 1983-84 of student awards, distinguishing between mandatory and discretionary awards and between awards for fees and for maintenance, and including an estimate of the administrative costs involved.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

1983-84 Financial Year

	£ million
Mandatory awards in England, Wales and Northern Ireland Students ' allowances in Scotland	872·4
Discretionary Awards—United Kingdom	*146·0

* provisional

Full information which would enable a distinction to be made between awards for fees and maintenance is not available for the financial year 1983-84. No estimate of the administrative costs is available.

School Meals

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Prime Minister what is her latest estimate of the United Kingdom current price cost in 1983-84 of free school meals, distinguishing between those for pupils and those for teachers and supervisors.

The Prime Minister: "Free" meals are, of course, paid for through rates and taxes. The information requested is as follows:

United Kingdom	1983-84 Estimated Cost (cash terms) £ million
"Free" meals for—pupils	245
teachers	38
mid-day supervisory assistants	14

Note: The estimated gross expenditure on all meals has been apportioned to each of the groups shown pro rata to the number of meals taken by each group.

Rates

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Prime Minister if she will publish a table showing United Kingdom revenues from local authority rates in each year since 1978-79, including an estimate for 1984-85, and distinguishing between commercial and domestic rates.

The Prime Minister: The following is the available information:

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I recently met delegations from both the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union when we discussed a wide range of agricultural issues including milk quotas and their effects in Wales.

AIDS

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, in the light of the pattern of incidence of the cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the United Kingdom and in other countries, he plans any additional safeguards in relation to blood received at the Welsh blood transfusion centre and blood received in Wales from countries overseas, respectively.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Action has been already been taken to detect those at risk from AIDS and dissuade them from giving blood. The questionnaire which is completed by potential blood donors has been redesigned to help identify those who should not give blood, and a leaflet has been widely distributed which gives guidance about which groups of people are most at risk. For the near future laboratory tests are being developed to detect contaminated blood.

Buses (Revenue Support)

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing the total amounts paid to bus operators in respect of revenue support for the financial years 1974-75 and 1984-85, together with the total bus route mileage and passengers carried for each of the years in respect of each of the county councils in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Net revenue support paid to bus operators by each county council in Wales in the financial years 1974-75 and 1983-84 was as follows:

Figures for financial year 1984-85 are not yet available.

Net revenue support to bus operators 1974-75 and 1983-84

	1974-75 £	1983-84 £

* Includes small element of support to British Rail.

Details of total bus route mileage and passengers carried for each county in Wales for the years 1974-75 and 1984-85 are not available. Since 1981 the total number of passengers journeys in Wales has been:

Year	Total Million	Of which were stage carriage Million
1981	244·1	190·4
1982	227·1	181·5
1983	237·8	181·7

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Gower on 21 December 1984, Official Report, column 346, if he is yet in a position to write to the hon. Member for Gower about individuals he has appointed to public bodies.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I wrote to the hon. Gentleman on 6 February 1985.

Polytechnics

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to establish a second polytechnic in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No.

Roads (Safety Barriers)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications by county councils for the installation of safety barriers on trunk roads have been refused in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I regret that this information is not readily available, but the number of refusals is thought to be very small.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what criteria must be satisfied before safety barriers are installed on trunk roads in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The criteria for the provision of central reserve safety barriers on trunk roads in Wales are: for dual 2-lane carriageway roads, the anticipated traffic volume 7 years after opening of the road should exceed 20,000 vehicles per day; and in the case of dual 3-lane carriageway roads the figure is 30,000 vehicles per day.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what lengths of safety barriers have been replaced on motorways and on other trunk roads in Wales each year for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Safety barriers are replaced when they are damaged or when they have reached the end of their expected life. No figures are readily available of the lengths that have been replaced.

A483 (Lighting)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to provide lighting for the A483 Ruabon bypass.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Lighting will be provided at the Wynnstay junction, along the Wynnstay link and at the junction at the western end of the link. It will also be provided where the new by-pass joins the Wrexham bypass.

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales why the statement of claim setting our the full details of the amount claimed by the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation in respect of defects in the construction of the University Hospital of Wales has not been included in the details of the settlement placed in the Library; and whether he will now place the statement of claim in the Library.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information was not asked for but I have now placed a copy in the Library.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales which of the parties to the settlement relating to the defects at the University Hospital of Wales has objected to publication of its terms.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: S. W. Milburn Partnership.

Unlit Roads

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the total cost of accidents on unlit roads subject to a speed limit of (a) 60 mph and (b) 70 mph.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In 1983, the total cost of personal injury accidents in Wales in darkness on unlit roads subject to a speed limit of 60 mph is estimated at about £9 millions. The equivalent figures for such roads with a 70 mph speed limit is about £350,000. These figures comprise resource costs and an allowance for pain, grief and suffering.

Roads

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many miles of roads he is responsible for; and what proportion of the total are (a) motorways and (b) trunk roads with speed limits of (i) 70 mph, (ii) 60 mph and (iii) 50 mph.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: At April 1984, the total mileage of road for which the Secretary of State had responsibility was 1,102. This comprised 6·79 per cent. (74 miles) motorway and 93·3 per cent. (1,028 miles) trunk road.

Information on the length of trunk road with various speed limits is not available.

S. W. Milburn and Partners

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the contracts on which the architects S. W. Milburn and Partners have been employed by his Department or agencies funded by his Department over the past 10 years; and what was the sum paid to them in each instance.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is being sought. I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Private Educational Establishments

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those applications he has received for the payment of industrial development grant or urban development grant in respect of the development of private schools or colleges in Wales for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Our Department has received 3 applications for regional selective assistance but none for urban development grant towards the development of private schools or colleges in Wales. One offer of regional selective assistance has been made. For details of this I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 13 December 1984, at column 549

Cefn Mably Hospital

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those applications he has received for industrial development grant or urban development grant for the conversion or modification of the former Cefn Mably hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department has received an application for regional selective assistance but none for urban development grant towards a project to be located at the former Cefn Mably hospital. It is standard practice to conduct all negotiations about such assistance on a commercially confidential basis and it would not therefore be right for me to provide further information.

DEFENCE

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there will be any collaboration between the United Kingdom and the United States of America on research in connection with the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Butler: At her meeting with President Reagan last December, the Prime Minister told the President of her firm conviction that the strategic defence initiative research programme should go ahead. Any British Government involvement in the programme depends upon future discussions. The involvement of British companies would be covered by normal trading arrangements.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications for the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the defence of Western Europe of the United States strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Stanley: The strategic defence initiative is a long term research programme still in its early stages. Its overall aim is to enhance deterrence, the maintenance of which is central to the security of NATO.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is now part of NATO defence plans to use ground-launched cruise missiles with non-nuclear warheads.

Mr. Stanley: The NATO staff target for a long-range stand-off conventional missile calls for the evaluation of an air-launched and ground-launched capability. However, work is focussed primarily on an air-launched weapon. The use of conventional ground-launched cruise missiles does not currently form part of NATO defence plans.

AST 404

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce his decision on the AST 404.

Mr. Butler: We are continuing to explore all possible ways of satisfying air staff target 404. A decision will be made when all the options have been evaluated and it is clear that procurement funds are available.

First-strike Weapons

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation weapons which could be used in a first-strike.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many state pensioners receive housing benefit payments.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the precise form requested. It is estimated however that in Autumn 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 4·1 million pensioner households receiving housing benefit.

Pensioners

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the numbers of pensioners who have other incomes apart from state benefit, earned or unearned incomes, within the following categories: (a) nil, (b) up to £250 per year, (c) up to £500 per year, (d) up to £750 per year, (e) up to £1,000 per year, and (f) up to £1,250 per year.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Insurance Contributions

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the revenue effect (a) of abolishing the upper ceiling on payments to the national insurance fund broken down into employee and employer contributions and (b) of converting the present lower earnings exemption limit into an allowance on the same rules as used for income tax broken down between employee and employer contributions.

Mr. Whitney: Using the assumptions set out in his report on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) (No. 2) Order 1984 Cmnd. 9386, the Government Actuary calculates that were the upper earnings limit for contributions to be abolished, but the ceiling for the contracted-out rebate retained, the additional contributions revenue in a full year at 1985-86 rates accruing to the national insurance fund would be:

(a) £625 million from employees.
(b) £720 million from employers.

There would also be a proportional increase in Treasury supplement and interest on investments accruing to the fund.

Because the rules for the assessment of liability for national insurance contributions are substantially different from those for income tax, it is not practicable to estimate the financial implications of converting the Lower Earnings Limit for contributions into an allowance as used for tax purposes. However, were all weekly earnings below the lower earnings limit exempt from contributions liability as earnings up to the amount of the annual allowance are exempt from tax, the loss to the national insurance fund on the same basis as above would be:

(a) £2·6 billion in respect of employees.
(b) £3·4 billion in respect of employers.

"Counter Benefits"

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received a copy of the Scottish Consumer Council report, "Counter Benefits"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a copy of the Scottish Consumer Council report "Counter Benefits".

The Department recognises the need continually to monitor and improve its quality of service, indeed this has been a management priority for the past three years. We have always welcomed comment particularly from agencies who have a close interest in the Department's work.

We do not accept that the report is fully representative in view of the methods of sampling and research employed. The report itself recognises the possibility of bias in the research findings to some extent. However we remain committed to improving service and will continue to welcome constructive criticism.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will amend the "S manual" procedure for paying the special allowance for exceptionally severe weather so that all supplementary benefit claimants in eligible areas will receive the allowance.

Mr. Whitney: No. It is for the independent adjudication authorities to decide whether claimants are entitled to benefit under the supplementary benefit regulations, and if so how much. Some claimants in areas where the weather has been exceptionally severe will not be entitled to payments under the relevant regulation, because, for example, they have not spent more on fuel than they budgeted for or because they have savings over £500 sufficient to pay for the extra fuel they have used. In each case the amount payable if any must be established from information provided by the claimant when he receives his fuel bill for the relevant period.

The help which is available has been publicised in the areas in which the chief adjudication officer has advised local adjudication officers that the 'exceptionally severe weather' condition in the regulation has been satisfied and leaflets explaining how and when to claim are available from all local social security offices in these areas.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the terms of reference of his review into the formula for exceptionally severe weather payments made under Single Payments Regulation No. 26; and who is to sit on the committee reviewing the allowances;

(2) if he will list the organisations he is inviting to give evidence to his review into the formula for calculating exceptionally severe weather payments.

Mr. Whitney: The formula to which the hon. Member refers is contained in guidance issued by the chief adjudication officer rather than my right hon. Friend. In reviewing that guidance in the light of experience this winter he will no doubt take account of views expressed by hon. and right hon. Members and will seek such expert advice as he thinks necessary. More generally, as explained in my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member on 18 January at column 261, the Government are looking at the provision for meeting special expenses of this sort in the context of the supplementary benefit review which received evidence from over 600 organisations and individuals.

Head and Neck Injuries

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children have been admitted to hospitals in each year since 1979 with skull fractures, lesions of the head and neck and injuries to the lumbar region resulting from non-accidental wounds.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the external cause of injury of patients admitted to hospitals is not collected centrally.

Venereal Disease

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of venereal disease in girls under the age of 16 years have been reported in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is given in the table. Information on the age of patients is not available for sexually transmitted diseases other than the two listed.

Year	Primary and secondary syphilis	Post pubertal gonorrhoea
1979	2	303
1980	3	305
1981	—	265

Children (Sexual and Physical Abuse)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children have been taken into care by local authorities in the West Midlands region after being sexually abused in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally. Relevant records will be maintained by individual authorities in the West Midlands.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available to local education authorities to enable the level of provisions for treating and rehabilitating sexually and physically abused children.

Mr. John Patten: It is for local health and social service authorities to provide, in collaboration with education departments, relevant services to help abused children, in the light of locally perceived needs and the priority that can be given to them.

Heart Replacement Surgery

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the length of time that the 68 patients requiring heart replacement surgery had been waiting in the Harefield hospital or the Papworth hospital prior to death; and if he will list the range of their age groups.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has given any financial or other help to groups or individuals seeking to assist people who have become addicted to prescribed sedatives or tranquillisers.

Mr. John Patten: A number of voluntary organisations receive grants for services to problem drug takers and some of these include the users of prescribed sedatives and tranquillisers among their clientele. In addition grants have been made under the Central Funding Initiative to the following organisations which cater specifically for the needs of people addicted to prescribed sedatives or tranquillisers.

Voluntary organisations	Description of Project	Cost (£)
Tranx	Self-help group—tranquilliser misuse—Harrow	89,183
Tranx Release (Northampton)	Advisory and self-help service —tranquilliser misuse	29,892
West Cumbria MIND (Copeland)	Self help group and other services for tranquilliser misusers.	85,442

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research has been carried out by or for his Department into the extent and seriousness of addiction to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives.

Mr. John Patten: There has been no research specifically into the extent of addiction to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives.

The Department has funded two studies into the prevalence of drug misuse generally (including tranquillisers and sedatives). One which was carried out under the direction of Dr. A. Thorley, St. Nicholas hospital, Newcastle-upon-tyne was completed in 1982. The other has taken place in Camden and Islington under the supervision of Dr. M. Mitcheson of the University College hospital drug dependence clinic. A draft manual produced by the project for the use of health authorities in identifying drug misuse problems is currently being considered by the Department.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from groups and individuals seeking to further the interests of people who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives.

Mr. John Patten: Six voluntary organisations concerned to assist people who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives have applied to the Department for grants for local projects under the central funding initiative. Three have been approved to date and are listed in another reply to the hon. Member today. The others are under consideration.

Girocheque Frauds

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate the extent of social security girocheque frauds, in which clients cash cheques for furniture and other specific grants with shopkeepers rather than exchange them for the goods arranged, in some circumstances being charged for doing this; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: While single payments of supplementary benefit are usually made by girocheque payable to the claimant, payments in respect of furniture or other major items of household equipment are normally made out to the supplier on the basis of previously obtained estimates, the girocheque being sent to the claimant. If there is any doubt that the payment will be properly spent the claimant

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all local education authorities in England, indicating in each case whether (a) a fully comprehensive system operates, (b) a fully selective system operates, or (c) whether some combination of selective and comprehensive system operates.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 11 February 1985, c. 7]: Information is not available in the form requested. Some local education authorities, while not maintaining any grammar schools, do maintain some schools which fall into the category of "other secondary" schools and cannot therefore be regarded as being fully comprehensive. The table shows those authorities which at January 1984 maintained no grammar schools and those which maintained at least one grammar school. All authorities maintained at least one comprehensive school.

SCOTLAND

Tree-felling Licences

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to transfer responsibility for issuing tree-felling licences in cases concerning small farm woodlands from the Forestry Commission to the county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce such legislation. The Forestry Commission is the only body which has both the qualified staff and the countrywide organisation to implement a fair and uniform policy with regard to the issue of felling licences. The views of local authorities on proposed fellings are expressed through the consultation procedures operated by the commission.

Class Sizes

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many children are taught in composite classes in each region and island authority;

(2) what is the average class size in the primary schools of each education authority in Scotland; and what were the equivalent figures for 1979-80.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not readily available. I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Ambulance Cover (Strathclyde)

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the ambluance cover in the Strathclyde area at night, giving area breakdowns, population and number of ambulance crew members.

Mr. John MacKay: The informaion is not available in precisely the form requested. The ambulance service is divided for management purposes into areas which are not conterminous with local authority boundaries, and there is some overlap of coverage, particularly round Glasgow. The population figures, therefore, are only approximate. The available information is as follows:

Ambulance area	Approx population	Back-Shift (2 pm—10.30 pm)	Night-Shift (10 pm—7.30 am)
Glasgow area	1,000,000	15 double-manned ambulances	9 double-manned ambulances

The on call duty system is operated by ambulance staff standing by at home outside normal working hours.

Free School Transport

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide details of the number of pupils for whom education authorities in Scotland provide free school transport.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) on 23 January, at column 420.

Education Costs

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the per capita cost per pupil in primary and secondary schools in each local authority in Scotland (a) at the latest available date and (b) in 1977-78 expressed (i) at current prices and (ii) in 1977-78 prices in each case.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is shown in the following table:

Improvement Grant (Rateable Values)

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present rateable value limit for improvement grant purposes; and what proposals he has for increasing it in the light of revaluation and any other factors.

Mr. Younger: Different rateable value limits are fixed for different local authority areas. They range from £225 in Orkney and the Western Isles to £465 in Bearsden and Milngavie. It is proposed to increase these limits as from 1 April in the light of the general revaluation of property.

EMPLOYMENT

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report for the most recent available date for each metropolitan and non-metropolitan district the number of notifiable installations constituting a major hazard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have set out in the Official Report the numbers of installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 for each county in Wales in my replies to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 17 January, at column 214, and on 29 January at column 89; in England in my reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 7 February, at columns 641-42, and for each regional or island council in Scotland in my reply to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 7 February, at column 641. An analysis by districts could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

HGV Tests (Unemployed Persons)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Employment what financial provision is made by the Manpower Services Commission for the unemployed to take heavy goods vehicle tests.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In the current financial year the Manpower Services Commission has made provision to train 369 people in heavy goods vehicle driving under its training opportunities scheme, at an estimated cost of £331,500.

Retail Industry

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what funds are available for training in the retail industry; and how much has been spent on this training by the Distributive Industries Training Trust in each of the financial years since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information on the amount of public-funded assistance available to the retail industry can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the Manpower Services Commission makes a wide range of grants available to all employers within the industry including for computer skills training, the adoption of redundant apprentices and the industrial placement of sandwich course students as well as for new industry-wide initiatives concerned with the training of managers, trainers, women and ethnic groups. In addition, funding under the youth training scheme and the adult training strategy is available for training school leavers and adults respectively.

The Distributive Industries Training Trust is an independent organisation which was established last year and is registered with the Charity Commission. I understand that the trustees have decided that, for the first two years, training should be funded from the interest accruing from the trust's invested capital. Some training funds have been approved recently and further applications will be considered.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of notified vacancies at each jobcentre in Lancashire by standard industrial classification for the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is only available at disproportionate cost; but will be readily available later this year and in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Burnley travel-to-work area have never had a job by age, group and sex.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the old Burnley travel-to-work area is available in the House of Commons Library. Information by age group and sex for the new Burnley travel-to-work area will be available in the House of Commons Library later this year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the monthly increase and the total number of persons employed by community industry in west Cumbria during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In January 1985, 100 young people were employed by the community industry unit in west Cumbria, a decrease of one compared with the previous month. In addition, 16 adult staff are employed at the unit.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what proportion of (a) unemployed males and (b) unemployed females in the Workington travel-to-work area had been out of work for (i) one year, (ii) two years and (iii) three years at the latest available date;

(2) what proportion of (a) unemployed males and (b) unemployed females in the Barrow in Furness, Kendal, Whitehaven, Carlisle, Keswick and Penrith travel-to-work areas had been out of work for (i) one year, (ii) two years and (iii) three years at the latest available date;

(3) what was the total of young people who have become unemployed and who have registered at unemployment benefit offices in each travel-to-work area in Cumbria in the last month for which statistics are available;

(4) how many young persons aged 16 to 18 years were unemployed in the Workington travel-to-work area during the last month for which statistics are available;

(5) how many people in the Workington travel-to-work area have been unemployed for (a) up to six months, (b) six months to 12 months, (c) 12 months to 18 months, (d) 18 months to two years and (e) over two years during the last month for which statistics are available;

(6) what was the total number of young people under the age of 18 years who were registered as claimants at unemployment benefit offices at the latest date for which statistics are available in each travel-to-work area in the county of Cumbria.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information relating to the old travel-to-work areas is in the House of Commons Library. Detailed information on unemployment in the new travel to work areas will be available in the Library later this year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the unemployment figures for the county of Cumbria, categorised by sex, age and the duration of unemployment, for the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is available in the House of Commons Library.

Trade Unions (Ballots)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to how many trade unions have amended their constitutions to elect their national officers by secret postal ballot under section 22 of the Trade Union Act 1984 since the Act came into effect.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to recent press reports, the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs, the Association of University Teachers, the Association of Professional Executive Clerical and Computer Staff, the General Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education and the Transport Salaried Staffs Association are considering changes to their rules so as to bring their electoral arrangements into line with the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984. Enforcement of these provisions is a matter for individual trade unionists, who can complain to the certification officer or the courts if they believe elections have not been conducted in accordance with the rights conferred on union members by the 1984 Act.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Health and Safety Executive is taking to publish lists of active ingredients and products used in wood treatment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on active ingredients of wood preservatives is issued in the series "Chemical Compounds Used as Pesticides". These recommendation sheets are available from the Health and Safety Executive. There are no plans to publish this information in list form.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many instances of (a) suspected, and *(b)*confirmed poisonings by pesticides used in wood treatment were investigated by the Health and Safety Executive, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; in how many instances the public were involved; and in how many cases a prosecution resulted.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A comprehensive central record is not kept of the information requested.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the oral and dermal acute toxicities, the chronic toxicities, and mutagenic, carcinogenic or teratogenic properties of (a) methyl isocyanate and (b) methyl isothiocyanate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Methyl isocyanate has been reported to cause nausea, vomiting and diarrhoea when accidently ingested by humans. It is known to be of high oral toxicity to rats and mice. No data are available on systemic effects following dermal exposure in humans, although tests have shown moderate dermal toxicity in rabbits. When inhaled, methyl isocyanate is a potent irritant and causes bronchospasm and lung damage which can be fatal both to humans and animals. Skin contact can cause severe burns and methyl isocyanate can seriously injure the eyes. Bacterial mutagenicity tests have been found not to produce genetic damage. There are no available data on carcinogenicity or teratogenicity.

One case of accidental death is known following ingestion of methyl isothiocyanate, caused by severe damage of the upper gastric tract. Methyl isothiocyanate has been known to have caused corneal, liver and kidney damage in rats and mice. Animal tests have shown dermal toxicity low for rats and mice but higher for rabbits. There are no available data on carcinogenicity, teratogenicity or mutagenicity other than a two-year study of rats exposed to methyl isothiocyanate in drinking water which reported no effects at a level of 10 mg/litre.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those pesticide products used in wood treatment which contain (a) dieldrin, (b) DDT, (c) lidanne, (d) tributyl tin oxide or similar compounds and (e) benzene hexachloride.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

School Leavers

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many students living in the borough of Sunderland and attending state schools in the borough left school in July 1984; how many got places on a youth training scheme; and how many have not yet had any kind of job.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not readily available in the form requested. According to the Sunderland careers service, whose area covers Houghton le Spring, Washington and Sunderland, at 3 January 1985, of the 3,893 young people who left school or college in 1984 and registered with the careers service for employment, 2,690 (69 per cent.) were in the youth training scheme; 585 (15 per cent.) were unemployed; and the remaining 618 (16 per cent.) were in employment. Some of those unemployed had been on the youth training scheme or had a job since leaving full-time education and some of those in employment had also spent some time on the youth training scheme.

Nurses

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many nurses were registered as unemployed in (a) the Liverpool travel-to-work area and (b) the Merseyside special development area at the latest available date; and what were the figures for each of the last three years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested, in respect of registrants at jobcentres, is available in the House of Commons Library. The latest figures relate to September 1982.

UN Decade for Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had with the Equal Opportunities Commission with a view to realising the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend and I have had consultations with the Equal Opportunities Commission about many issues relevant to the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women. For example, we had fruitful consultations about our proposals for legislation on equal pay for work of equal value; we have provided funding to assist it in its excellent current project "Women into Science and Engineering"; and my right hon. Friend has recently approved and laid before the House its draft code of practice on the elimination of sex discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will consider publishing a statement on Her Majesty's Government's response to the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire giving details of any future plans for extending the range, availability or duration of wider opportunities for women courses.

Mr. Alan Clark: Within existing resources, the Manpower Services Commission is seeking to help more women by making wider opportunities for women courses more cost-efficient and by aligning them more closely with local labour market needs.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will produce an updated version of Her Majesty's Government's response to the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire taking account of any subsequent available information on the range of courses studied under the youth training scheme by women.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Manpower Services Commission is maintaining its commitment to a policy of equal opportunity for all young people eligible to join the youth training scheme, regardless of their sex, race or disability. The commission is promoting this policy, with measures to ensure that young women have equal access to enter the full range of scheme programmes. Additional steps have been taken with the use of publicity material to encourage young women to enter for training in non-traditional areas of work.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had with the Manpower Services Commission with a view to realising the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since the commencement of the United Nations Decade for Women, the Government have worked and will continue to work through the Manpower Services Commission to improve the range and quality of training available to women, as a direct contribution to the aims of the Decade. The commission has a policy of equal access to all its programmes and encourages women to participate in "non-traditional" courses. The commission also operates a programme of development activities aimed at industry and commerce, to demonstrate the economic benefits which can result from developing women's potential to the full.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he has taken subsequent to Her Majesty's Government's response to the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire to encourage participation by boys and girls in non-traditional areas of study under the technical and vocational education initiative.

Mr. Alan Clark: From its inception the technical and vocational education initiative has given high priority to the provision of equal opportunities for boys and girls and this is reflected in the criteria set by the national steering group, which advises the Manpower Services Commission running this pilot scheme.

Across the 62 projects now operating, take-up of places has sometimes tended to follow traditional lines, but the schools and colleges involved are actively developing strategies to encourage both boys and girls to take advantage of the opportunities that exist in all subject areas. TVEI advisers are monitoring developments and a programme of national workshops is planned to assist projects in developing strategies further.

We hope that Barking and all other local education authorities not currently participating in the initiative will respond positively to the commission's recent invitation to submit a proposal for a project to begin this year or next.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether any changes will be made to the cash-limited Votes for his Department.

Mr. Tom King: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for Class IV, Vote 17 will be increased from £232,298,000 by £9,000,000 to £241,298,000. There will be no addition to the planning total of public expenditure, since a corresponding reduction will be made in the cash limit for Class IV, Vote 13 relative to Labour Market Services (Department of Employment) which will be reduced from £692,622,000 to £683,622,000. The increase on Vote 17 is required to meet the cost of additional staff in the unemployment benefit service to cover the consequences of revised economic assumptions and of the industrial action by staff at the Department of Health and Social Security at Newcastle.

THE ARTS

Local Authority Investment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what levels of investment have been allocated by individual local authorities towards activities in respect of the arts (a) in London and (b) in the West Midlands county in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

CIVIL SERVICE

UN Decade for Women

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister for the Civil Service what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken in relation to article 63(b) of the 1975 world plan of action for the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 prohibits discrimination by the Government in making appointments to public office and by employers in recruiting and promoting employees. The Equal Opportunities Commission, established under the Act with the duty of promoting equality, monitors women's success in achieving public office and their situation in the labour market and advises both public and private sector employers on developing equal opportunity policies. The Government's annual labour force survey provides information about the number of women employed in the public service and their occupations. In regard to that part of the public service which is directly under Government control, the Government announced on 9 February 1984 in both Houses of Parliament a programme of action on women in the Civil Service, consisting of 70 items covering the whole spectrum of equal opportunities issues.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Establishments Office (Equal Opportunities Officer)

Mr. Soames asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what are the duties of the equal opportunities officer in the Establishments Office; and what is his salary.

Mr. Beith: The designated equal opportunities officer in the House of Commons is the Deputy Head of the Establishments Office. He was so designated following publication in January 1984 of the "Report on the Review of Personnel Policies and Procedures in the Civil Service", applied by analogy in the House of Commons Service. As equal opportunities officer he is responsible for advising House Departments on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern both race and sex discrimination. As Deputy Head of the Establishment Office his duties cover the whole range of personnel matters, of which equal opportunities policy is but one part. His salary, linked to the Civil Service grade 6, is currently in the range of £17,529 to £23,134 pa (including £1,300 pa Inner London weighting).

DEFENCE

Submarines

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in view of the representations recently made by the Irish Government to the International Maritime Organisation about the growth in the number of incidents involving fishing vessels and submerged submarines, he will undertake a review of regulations relating to the movement of submarines in coastal waters around Britain and Ireland and in the Irish sea.

Mr. Lee: The level of incidents involving fishing vessels and Royal Navy submarines has not grown in recent years. While I am satisfied at present with the procedures relating to the movement of submarines in the waters around the British Isles, these are, of course, kept under regular review.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is North Atlantic Treaty Organisation policy to achieve equality in nuclear weapons with those of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Stanley: In the previous negotiations on strategic and intermediate range nuclear weapons, the United States sought to reach balanced, equitable and verifiable agreement with the Soviet Union on the basis of equal limits of nuclear weapons in the same categories.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear in Washington on 22 December the purpose of the resumed US-Soviet negotiations on arms control is to achieve security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides. The US and Western aim is not to achieve superiority, but to maintain balance, taking account of Soviet developments.

Defence Policy

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the objectives of United Kingdom defence policy, distinguishing between those appertaining to the United Kingdom, British dependent territories, British military alliances and wider British interests, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: The principal objectives of United Kingdom defence policy are to preserve peace with freedom and to ensure the security of the nation and that of our NATO allies through collective deterrence against attack. We also seek to discharge our responsibilities for the external defence of our dependent territories, and to promote our security interests beyond the NATO area by means of exercises, deployments, peacekeeping, military sales and assistance, and the maintenance of a capability for military intervention. Further details have been given in successive "Statements on the Defence Estimates."

Research

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the universities, hospitals or other establishments in the United Kingdom at which research directly or indirectly sponsored by his Department is taking place or has taken place over the last three years.

Mr. Lee: Over the past three years the Ministry of Defence has directly sponsored research at a large number of the United Kingdom universities and polytechnics and some of their associated hospital research departments and institutes. I will place a list of the bodies concerned in the Library of the House. It is not our practice to give details of research contracts.

Information on indirect involvement could not be extracted without disproportionate effort.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the purpose of the research carried out on behalf of his Department at the university of Glasgow involving the toxins from anthrax basilli and cholera organisms;

(2) if he will make a statement on the purpose of the research carried out on behalf of his Department at the university of Kent at Canterbury involving tricothenes.

Mr. Lee: It is not the policy of this Government or their predecessors to give information of this nature concerning research contracts.

VX Gas

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what stocks of VX gas are held by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Stanley: There are no chemical weapons declared to NATO. Details of limited United States national stocks are a matter for that Government.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the number of jobs in the United Kingdom which are directly or indirectly dependent on trade in defence equipment and services with Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to estimate the number of jobs in the United Kingdom which are directly or indirectly dependent on trade in defence equipment and services with Sri Lanka. Details of such trade are, of course, confidential between the two Governments, but the volume of business of this kind is not large.

Remotely Piloted Vehicle

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is any nearer reaching a decision on the remotely piloted vehicle for the British Army.

Mr. Butler: Yes. I expect to be in a position to make an announcement on this matter shortly.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what obstacles exist to the conclusion of an international agreement to end underground nuclear testing; and what effort Her Majesty's Government have made in the past year to overcome them.

Mr. Luce: I have been asked to reply.

As I said to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 11 December, at column 450, current techniques of seismic verification require significant improvement as a first step towards a comprehensive test ban. We were disappointed that there was no discussion at the conference on disarmament at Geneva last year of the paper on verification problems tabled by the United Kingdom in 1983. However, we took part last year in a worldwide experiment to test methods for exchanging seismological data.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa (Nuclear Capability)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will consider introducing controls or regulations to require British citizens to obtain authorisation before providing expertise which could enhance South Africa's nuclear capability on the same basis as those enacted in the United States of America in February 1983.

Mr. Luce: No. We adhere to our policy of no collaboration with South Africa in the development of its nuclear programme, but do not intend to restrict the freedom of private individuals to work in, or for, South Africa.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the working of the high commission in Sierra Leone; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Prime Minister what is her estimate of the United Kingdom current price costs of rate rebates in 1982-83 and in 1983-84, showing the cost of rate rebates paid with supplementary benefit as separate sub-totals.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

United Kingdom

European Stamp

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister what instruction has been given to the United Kingdom delegate to the Committee for a People's Europe regarding the proposal for a European stamp without the picture of Her Majesty the Queen.

The Prime Minister: The Committee on People's Europe has not at any time discussed the inclusion or non-inclusion of the Queen's head on any stamp, nor has the United Kingdom representative made any proposal on this point in the committee.

Committee for a People's Europe

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister what were the criteria for appointing the United Kingdom delegate to the Committee for a People's Europe; and to which Ministers he will report.

The Prime Minister: A wide experience of Community affairs and a commitment to simplifying its rules. The United Kingdom contribution to the committee's work falls within the general responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Ministerial Cars (Parking Regulations)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer, 1 February, Official Report, column 327, in what circumstances, other than for reasons of emergency, may drivers of ministerial cars not obey the parking regulations.

The Prime Minister: Government car service drivers are under instruction to meet the requirement of their passengers as they arise, including requirements imposed by security. Ministers may on occasion require cars to stand by because of urgent parliamentary and other business. As a result of arrangements recently made, the extent to which GCS cars have to wait in restricted areas will significantly reduce.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, of people who are in prison because of supergrass evidence, how many have been remanded in prison for (a) three months, (b) six months, (c) nine months, (d) 12 months, (e) 15 months, (f) 18 months, (g) 21 months, (h) 24 months, (i) 27 months and (j) 30 months; of these people, how many have been convicted, acquitted or have actually gone to trial; and what was their period of detention or remand.

Mr. Scott: Information on remand times for those at present on remand in custody, charged on the basis of evidence from alleged accomplices, is not separately available and could be obtained only by a special exercise at disproportionate cost. Nor is it possible for the same reason to provide information directly comparable to that provided in my reply to similar questions from the hon. Member on 21 March 1984, at column 497, and 19 July 1984, at column 283.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for each year since 1980 what is the number of prisoners refused bail; and what is the average period of remand without bail for persons accused and charged either wholly or partially on the basis of accomplice evidence in each of the following categories (a) the top decile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period, (b) the top quartile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period, (c) the second quartile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period; and what is the average period of remand for all prisoners charged on the basis of such evidence.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: The number of applications for bail which were refused in each year since 1980 was as follows:

	Number
1980	728
1981	951
1982	990
1983	855
1984	849

Information on remand times for those at present on remand in custody who have been charged on the basis of evidence from alleged accomplices is not separately available and could be obtained only by a special exercise at disproportionate cost. Nor is it possible for the same reason to provide information directly comparable to that provided in my reply to a similar question from the hon. Member on 31 July 1984, at column 136.

Dairy Farmers

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have a herd size of less than 150 cows;

(2) how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have a herd size in excess of 150 cows;

(3) how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have a herd of less than 40 cows;

(4) how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have a herd size of less than 80 cows;

(5) how many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have a herd size of less than 120 cows.

Dr. Boyson: The statistics are not readily available exactly as requested. The available statistics from the June 1984 agricultural census are as follows:

Size of dairy herd	Number of farms
Less than 40 cows	5,207
Less than 70 cows	7,008
Less than 100 cows	7,704
Less than 200 cows	8,061
100 cows and over	379
200 cows and over	22
All sizes	8,083

Hydrocarbon Licences

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when applications for hydrocarbon licences will be invited in Northern Ireland; and what steps are being taken to promote such applications.

Dr. Boyson: I am placing in the Library the text of a notice which will appear in the London and Edinburgh Gazettes and in the Belfast Gazette. It indicates that the Department of Economic Development will accept applications for landward petroleum licences in Northern Ireland from 4 March 1985. The areas on offer for licensing are in East Antrim and in adjacent parts of East Tyrone/South Londonderry. From 4 March 1985 the Department is also making available for purchase a package of information, prepared by petroleum consultants and the Geological Survey of Northern Ireland on the potential of the area on offer for licensing. The Department will also be pleased to arrange, on request, subsequent discussions with its advisers for all those companies which purchase this information. In order to give time for corporate analysis of the information being released, and discussions with departmental advisers, the closing date for the receipt of licensing applications is 28 June 1985.

Hijacked Vehicles

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the years 1983 and 1984 the following details: (a) the number of vehicles hijacked or taken and (b) the number not recovered at the end of each year, in each of the following police districts, separately: Musgrave street, Springfield road, Tennent street, North Queen street, Mountpottinger, Castlereagh, Newtownards, Newry, Portadown, Armagh, Enniskillen, Omagh, Strand road, Coleraine, Ballymena and Antrim.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 714]: The available information is as follows:

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

"Home Defence and the Farmer"

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list the visits outside the United Kingdom made by members of his Department in the course of their work to revise "Home Defence and the Farmer", in the last five years.

Mrs. Fenner: No such visits have been made.

Nuclear Defence

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the seminars and conferences held in the United Kingdom relating to the problems of nuclear defence and agriculture which representatives of his Department have been invited to attend.

Mrs. Fenner: Invitations were received to conferences on the land and defence at Oxford in March 1984 and on the nuclear winter at Exeter in September 1984.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a Green Paper on pesticides and environment policy review.

Mrs. Fenner: No. Part III of the Food and Environment Protection Bill, which has just received its First Reading in the House, seeks powers to ensure the safe and efficient use of pesticides, taking full account of environmental concerns. It was drafted after wide-ranging consultation with interested organisations. The Government are committed to a second round of consultation on the detailed content of implementary regulations, and a discussion document will be issued for that purpose, as soon as possible.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give a timetable for the drawing up of regulations, consultations with interested parties and the issuing and implementation of regulations for the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords].

Mrs. Fenner: Subject to the views of Parliament on part III of the Food and Environment Protection Bill, I hope that the Government will be in a position to circulate a new consultation document detailing the proposed regulations and the administrative arrangements which will accompany them in the late spring. The consultations on these proposals will continue for as long as necessary, but our aim is to lay the regulations in Parliament this autumn, with a view to their entry into force early in 1986.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements he intends making to allow observers to attend the meetings of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides; and what steps he is taking to make public its proceedings, apart from publication of an annual report.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government believe that the discussions of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides should be conducted in such a way as to allow them to take place with frankness and informality. Furthermore, the committee is dealing with information, some of which is commercially sensitive and valuable and which, therefore, cannot be made public. For these reasons, I and my right hon. Friends believe that an annual report containing safety assessments and the recommendations of the ACP is the right way of informing the public of its work.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those pesticide products cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme containing methyl isothiocyanate, or liberating methyl isothiocyanate when used.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what study he has made in the context of the preparation of the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords] of the United States system of rebuttable presumptions against registration issued as a revokable injunction against the use of pesticides suspected of causing a serious environmental, safety or health hazard; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I am aware of the system of review of approval of pesticides employed in the United States. In the UK, the pesticides safety precautions scheme already includes provision for the clearance of any pesticide to be reviewed in the light of new scientific evidence on risk. Where appropriate, clearance can be revoked and the pesticide withdrawn from use. In addition, we are proposing, under the Food and Environment Protection Bill, reviews of the registration status of all pesticide products approved for use in this country at regular intervals. I am satisfied that these arrangements provide the necessary controls.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has made any studies and if it has any forecast or estimates available to it of the number of pesticides expected to be approved, and of the volume of pesticide active ingredients expected to be used, in 1986, 1990, 1985 and 2000.

Mrs. Fenner: No. It is not possible to predict how many new chemicals will be developed and how many of those will achieve approval for use in the UK. For similar reasons, we do not make estimates of future pesticides usage. However, it is our declared policy aim to reduce usage to the minimum consistent with efficient agricultural and horticultural production.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many pesticide clearances or approvals he expects to revoke or suspend as a result of the powers he is seeking under the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords], in its first year.

Mrs. Fenner: If the Food and Environment Protection Bill is approved the Government intend to review existing clearances, but it is too soon to anticipate the result.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of occasions in each of the past five years in which Ministers failed to act on a recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides regarding the safety clearance of a pesticide.

Mrs. Fenner: During the last five years, Ministers have accepted and acted upon all the final recommendations of the advisory committee for pesticides regarding safety clearances.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the members of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides and of each of its sub-committees, giving in each case occupation and qualifications for membership.

Mrs. Fenner: Current members of the advisory committee on pesticides are:

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those pesticides which are cleared for aerial spraying and which are also classified as poisonous substances.

Mrs. Fenner: The Poisonous Substances in Agriculture Regulations 1984* prescribe the precautions to be taken when using specified substances in agriculture. Products containing the following substances specified in the regulations have clearance for aerial application:

azinphos-methyl
chlorfenvinphos demephion demeton-S-methyl dichlovos fentin acetate omethoate oxydemeton-methyl phorate (granules only) phosphamidon
thiometon

With the exception of phorate, all these products fall in the lowest risk category (schedule 2, part III) of the regulations, which require certain protective clothing to be worn when handling the product in concentrated form, or when acting as a ground marker during aerial application. There is no statutory requirement for users to wear protective clothing when handling the product in dilute form. Phorate falls into a higher risk category (schedule 2, part II), but is only cleared for aerial application in granular form.

Wartime Farm Wardens

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) from what sources wartime farm wardens would be recruited;

(2) if he will publish his contingency plans to appoint wartime farm wardens;

(3) what criteria would govern the establishment of groups of farms to be supervised by wartime farm wardens; and what alternative criteria have been considered by his Department;

(4) if he will list the duties and responsibilities of wartime farm wardens.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 7 February at column 694 to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas).

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farm wardens would be appointed by his Department in the event of threatened hostilities.

Mrs. Fenner: On the basis of one warden for about 20 farms there would be about 6,000 wardens.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish details of the organisation, structure and composition of the proposed wartime local control organisation for agriculture, fisheries and food.

Mrs. Fenner: Details of the local agricultural control organisation were published in Home Office circular ES 1/79 sent to local authorities in January 1979 and are repeated in section 11 of the new consolidated circular on civil defence sent to local authorities in draft for comment in July 1984.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a map showing the areas to be served by each wartime farm warden.

Mrs. Fenner: No.

"Home Defence and the Farmer"

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will arrange a press conference for the launch of the new edition of "Home Defence and the Farmer".

Mrs. Fenner: Arrangements for the launch of this booklet will be decided when a date for publication has been set.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inquiries were received during 1984 about a new edition of "Home Defence and the Farmer"; and how long it is since stocks of the previous publication ran out.

Mrs. Fenner: Many oral inquiries are made about this booklet but these are not recorded. Thirty one written inquiries were received in 1984. This includes 15 parliamentary questions. Stocks of the booklet ceased to be available from Her Majesty's Stationery Office in June 1974.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 558]: A list of the public bodies sponsored by my Department together with information on levels of Government funding is given in pages 5-8 of a booklet prepared by the Management and Personnel Office of the Cabinet Office entitled "Public Bodies 1984" and published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. My Department sponsors no nationalised industries.

Public Bodies sponsored by my Department are funded in a variety of ways which include payment by way of statutory levies and charges for individual services. Comprehensive information on specific services is not collected on a regular basis and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

As far as services provided by my Department are concerned, under the provisions of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1944 advice is provided free by my Department's agricultural development and advisory service. Information on services costing over £100,000 is collected annually for inclusion with other Departmental returns in the statement on fees and charges prepared by Treasury for submission to the Public Accounts Committee. The table sets out the information requested:

TRANSPORT

Motorway Lighting

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there have been any instances where lighting has been installed on a motorway to alleviate fog hazards; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes. Fog was a consideration in providing lighting on the following motorways:

	Junctions etc.
M1—	Junction 3 to Junction 14 inclusive and Junction 24 to Junction 26 inclusive.
M5—	Junction 15 to Junction 19 inclusive.
M6—	Junction 10 to Junction 11 inclusive and Junction 20 to Junction 27 inclusive
M54—M6	Interchange to Junction 2.
M58—	Junction 4 to Junction 6 inclusive.
M62—	Junction 21 to Junction 24 inclusive.
M65—	Junction 6 to Junction 10 inclusive.

We have instituted new studies to identify any stretches of the M25 and M42 motorways liable to fog.

Roads (Expenditure)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure on road construction and improvement for the last financial year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Chalker: Expenditure in England on road construction and improvements in 1983-84 was as follows:

	(£ million cash)
Motorways and trunk roads	514
Local authority roads, including new town roads	*453
Total	967

* (provisional).

Roads (Lancashire)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total mileage of (a) trunk motorways and (b) other trunk roads opened in Lancashire in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Year	Trunk Motorway (miles)	Other Trunk Roads (miles)
1980	Nil	Nil
1981	Nil	2·5
1982	Nil	Nil
1983	4·5	1·0

M62 (Capacity Requirements)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has now completed the assessment of the capacity requirements of the steeper sections of the M62 motorway in the Pennines as announced in the 1983 "Roads" White Paper.

Mrs. Chalker: No, but I expect to receive the consultants' report fairly shortly.

Roads (Lancashire-Yorkshire)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to improve road connections east to west between Lancashire and Yorkshire.

Mrs. Chalker: The 1983 roads White Paper lists proposed bypasses on the A616 and A65 routes which carry Lancashire to Yorkshire traffic. In addition, I am awaiting the results of studies into the capacity of the steeper sections of the M62 and into possible improvements to the A65 between Gargrave and the M6.

Motorways

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest position with regard to improvements in the motorway network in the north-west.

Mrs. Chalker: We propose to extend the motorway network by completing the Manchester outer ring road (M63/M66) and building the A6(M) Stockport north-south bypass. Our proposals for widening the two-lane section of M63 west of Manchester (including Barton bridge over the Manchester ship canal) are well advanced. Studies are currently being carried out into the future capacity of some sections of the M62 and M6 motorways.

Roads White Paper

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the next roads White Paper to be published.

Mrs. Chalker: I am currently reviewing the trunk road programme. I cannot yet say when the results will be published or in what form.

Road Maintenance Condition Survey

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the report of the 1984 national road maintenance condition survey will be published.

Mrs. Chalker: Final figures are in the course of preparation, and publication is expected around the end of February.

Dial-a-ride Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement on the discussions he has had with London borough councils about the future status and funding of the dial-a-ride service.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall answer this question shortly.

Wintex-Cimex '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the involvement of his Department in Wintex-Cimex '85.

Mr. Ridley: One of the objects of Wintex-Cimex '85 is to test procedures intended for use in times of tension and war. My Department plays its part in testing those procedures in which we have an interest.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Medical Students

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current cost of training a medical student from commencement to qualification; and how many medical students are currently in full-time education.

Mr. Brooke: The current cost of an undergraduate medical course — including home tuition fees but excluding maintenance awards — is approximately £110,000. In 1983-84 — the latest year for which statistics are available — there were 19,225 home and overseas, full-time undergraduate students studying medicine in Great Britain and 2,503 postgraduates.

Student Unions

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further representations he has had on introducing voluntary membership of student unions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Since I replied to my hon. Friend on 22 January, at column 375, around a dozen representations on this subject have been received from hon. Members and from student organisations. As was stated in another place on 6 February, at column 1059, by my noble Friend the Earl of Swinton, the Government propose to consult higher education interests about student unions. In doing so they will take into account the representations they have received.

High Energy Physics

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence has been submitted by his Department to the Kendrew committee's review of high energy physics.

Mr. Brooke: The high energy particle physics review group is an independent review commissioned jointly by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the Science and Engineering Research Council. The Department has not offered evidence to the group: the ABRC will in due course advise my right hon. Friend on the group's conclusions. The Department has indicated its willingness to help the group in any way it can and has provided some background financial information.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the total cost of meeting the National Union of Teachers current pay claim in full.

Sir Keith Joseph: The gross cost in 1985-86 of meeting the teachers' claim of a flat-rate increase of £1,200 for all teachers from 1 April 1985 would be some £600 million.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to include the Professional Association of Teachers on the negotiating sub-committee of the Burnham committee.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend very much regrets the obstacles that have been placed in the way of the Professional Association of Teachers making an effective contribution to the sub-committees of the Burnham committee. But the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965 does not give him powers to specify the committee's working arrangements or the composition of its subsidiary bodies. This matter is to be the subject of judicial review, with PAT's application expected to come before the court on 18 March.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the numbers of members of each of the teaching unions represented on the Burnham committee in each of the last 12 months and each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The number of members belonging to the teacher associations represented on the Burnham committees in each of the five years ending 1983 was as follows:

Name of Association	Membership Figures* 1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Primary and Secondary Committee
Assistant Masters' & Mistresses' Association (AMMA)	85,026	87,762	85,097	87,021	82,783

National Society for Education in Art and Design (NSEAD)	2,432	2,153	2,049	2,063	2,109

* Great Britain

Details are supplied annually by the teacher associations to the certification officer and include all categories of membership as at 31 December except for AMMA (30 June) and NSEAD (30 September). Such figures are not available for 1984 or for each of the last 12 months.

National Environment Research Council

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will meet the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council to discuss its proposals for substantially cutting the numbers of its scientific staff.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council. I have recently met him twice to discuss the council's corporate planning intentions, which amongst other matters, address the question of the number of scientific staff who might be employed by the council in future.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with teachers' representatives on the Burnham committee concerning teachers' pay; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: None. Schoolteachers' pay is negotiated in the Burnham Primary and Secondary Committee and is not a matter on which I normally hold direct discussions with the teacher unions.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what studies are being made or have been made of school attendance in areas where pesticide spraying is at a high level to investigate possible links between spraying and illness in children.

Mr. Dunn: None, so far as I am aware.

Teachers (Strike)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest strike by teachers in the maintained sector.

Sir Keith Joseph: I understand that the National Union of Teachers has called on its members to refuse to provide cover for absent colleagues, undertake lunchtime supervision and school activities outside timetabled school hours, or handle school meals payments. I am greatly concerned that the union should have called for this action which is designed to disrupt the education service and I hope individual teachers will think very carefully about the implications of heeding this call.

Rotherham Borough Council

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the level of educational capital expenditure that Rotherham borough council is to be allowed to undertake in 1985-86; and how this compares with the allocation in each of the last four years and with the other metropolitan education authorities.

Sir Keith Joseph: The education block allocation for Rotherham borough council for 1985-86, announced in January 1985, is £481,000; the total of allocations for the 36 metropolitan districts is £75,807,000. Equivalent information for the preceding four years is as follows:

	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 £
Rotherham	1,021,400	*406,112	*515,300	471,000
All Metropolitan Districts	96,939,680	74,654,028	67,880,380	77,084,000

*Supplementary allocations were made in the course of 1982-83 and 1983-84 of £1,086,000 and £150,000 respectively.

Dental Health

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources he proposes to make available to enable local education authorities to expand provision for dental health sessions in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The level of resources for the provision of dental services and education about dental health in schools is a matter for health authorities, local education authorities and schools themselves to determine, within the total resources available to them.

Exchange Visits (Emergency Hardship Money)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will continue to monitor the exchange rate of the pound sterling against the United States dollar, and take into account all future changes of the rate, when allocating emergency hardship money to the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges for assistance to British teachers on exchange contracts in the United States of America.

Mr. Brooke: Responsibility for the establishment and maintenance of its hardship fund for exchange teachers — British and foreign — and allocations from it are entirely matters for the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges.

Secondary Schools and Industry (Liaison)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he intends to take to encourage greater liaison between secondary schools and industry.

Mr. Dunn: Local liaison arrangements between secondary schools and industry are essentially matters for local education authorities and local employers. The Government wish to encourage such activities and are themselves providing direct financial help through, for example, the technical and vocational education initiative and the lower attaining pupils' programme. The Government already support, in some cases financially, the activities of the school/industry link organisations and they are also giving their full backing to Industry Year 1986. This will, amongst other things, encourage local firms and schools to develop new links and strengthen those which already exist. There are, therefore, no plans for further central initiatives at present.

Young and Disabled Children (Microcomputers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources he will make available to local education authorities to enable them to provide schools with suitable machines for young and disabled children who have difficulty in operating microcomputers.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave her on 5 February at column 515.

UN Decade for Women

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what consultations he has had with local education authorities to discuss ways of achieving the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women;

(2) what guidelines he has issued to local education authorities in order to achieve the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Brooke: The goal of the United Nations Decade for Women which is most relevant to the education service is the achievement of equality for women. My right hon. Friend has had no recent consultations with local education authorities specifically to discuss ways of achieving this goal, but equality of opportunity has been an important theme in consultations and guidance issued in relation to policy areas where this is a relevant consideration.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the University Grants Committee about ways of achieving the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has had no discussions with the University Grants Committee about the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women but he and the committee welcome the fact that the number of female undergraduate home new entrants to university has increased, as a proportion of the total, from 39·8 per cent. in 1979-80 to 41·3 per cent. in 1983-84.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has made since Her Majesty's Government answered the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire to ensure that equal curricular opportunities are available to both boys and girls.

Mr. Dunn: The Government had already made clear prior to their response to the United Nations questionnaire in February 1984 that genuinely equal curricular opportunities should be provided for boys and girls at all stages in the educational process, and have continued to support that view.

Mental Illness

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of the research being sponsored by his Department in the field of mental illness.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. I understand that the MRC is currently supporting a great deal of research work in the field of mental illness. Details can be found in the council's handbook 1984-85, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Research work relevant to mental illness is also being conducted in universities and medical schools. Much of this is financed from the block grant allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee. Information on such medical research work can be found in "Research in British Universities, Polytechnics and Colleges, Volume 2, Biological Sciences", published by the British Library, a copy of which is also available in the Library.

Medical Research

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science in determining support for medical research in any particular field, what account is taken of the likely effect of any breakthrough to the National Health Service.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. It is for the council to decide on the distribution of the resources available to it between the various areas of medical research. I understand that, in assessing applications for research support, the council always considers the possible relevance of the research to patient treatment. The council's membership includes members representing the health departments, and nominees of the health departments are on its three main research boards. The council's health services research panel, which includes representatives from health authorities, general practice and elsewhere, advises the council and its boards on research with special relevance to the health services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of the Medical Research Council's budget is directed to supporting studies of the nervous system and neurological and mental illnesses.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that approximately 10 per cent. of the Medical Research Council's budget is spent on projects primarily relevant to the nervous system including vision, hearing and anaesthetic agents. A further 7 per cent. of the council's budget is spent on projects primarily relevant to mental health, psychiatric disorders, behaviour and psychology. Details of the council's expenditure by subject heading are set out in its annual report, copies of which may be found in the Library.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what support is being provided by the Medical Research Council for clinical and laboratory research in the field of schizophrenia.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 25 January, at columns 558-59, to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter).

Youth Options Menu

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the purposes of a project sponsored or funded by him entitled Youth Options Menu; where, and by what methods, it operates; what financial or other arrangements have been made for its administration by the organisation Inter-Action; and for what period.

Mr. Brooke: The purpose of this project is to help youth service agencies extend their work with young people, especially the young unemployed. The project aims to collect and evaluate examples of good practice from several parts of the country, from which youth agencies can select relevant programmes. The project is administered by Inter-Action, subject to conditions of grant laid down by this Department, which include a steering group on which the Department is represented. Funding of the project by the Department is due to cease in September 1985.

Handicapped Pupils

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, pursuant to the reply of 29 January, Official Report, column 82, he will make known in the form of a circular to local authorities his view that local education authorities have a duty to provide full-time education for young people aged 16 to 19 years, who seek it, including those with special education needs.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have affirmed my view on this subject repeatedly and I am not persuaded that there is any need to restate it in a circular. I have, however, said that I intend to offer advice to the education system later in the year about the role of further education colleges in providing for young people with special educational needs. Such advice will clearly rest upon my view of the duty of local education authorities to secure provision for those aged 16 to 19.

University Grants

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what announcement the University Grants Committee has made to universities about grants for the academic year 1985-86.

Sir Keith Joseph: The University Grants Committee has announced universities' recurrent grant for the academic year 1985-86 as shown in the table following.

* Other additions specified in Annex B for each university or college.

The UGC will be writing further to universities about equipment and furniture grant for 1985-86.

Following is the text of the general letter of guidance which the chairman of the UGC has sent to all universities. Copies of the annexes relating to grants for individual universities will be placed in the Library of the House.

RECURRENT GRANT 1985/86

I am writing to give the Committee's decisions about the distribution of recurrent grant for the academic year (AY) 1985/86 (August 1985 to July 1986). The figures for all universities are given in Annex A. Annex B gives details of grants specific to your own institutions.

THE LEVEL OF RECURRENT GRANT FOR 1985/86

2. Recurrent grant for 1985/86 was announced by the Secretary of State for Education and Science on 12 November 1984. He said:

> "Subject to Parliamentary approval, the total of recurrent grant for universities in the UGC list for the 1985/86 academic year will be £1,309m. This total has been set at a level consistent with previously planned economies and with the Government's 3 per cent. assumption for pay. To the extent that the academic year falls partly in the 1986/87 financial year the grant is subject to review in the normal way.

3. The grant of £1,309m. includes provision for the third year of the programme of support for new blood and IT posts. It is £7m. less than the cash figure which underlay the provisional grant distribution for 1985/86 which was announced in Circular Letter 14/84. The reason for this is that the Government has now adopted an assumption that provision for increases in expenditure on pay in the financial year 1985/86 (April 1985 to March 1986) should be limited to 3 per cent. The provision for increased expenditure on non-pay items in that financial year remains at 4 per cent. The provision for cost increases from FY 1985/86 to 1986/87 has not been made explicit but is thought to be nearer 3 per cent. than 4 per cent.

DISTRIBUTION OF RECURRENT GRANT FOR 1985/86

4. The Committee has decided to apply the £7m reduction in year which results from the Government adopting a pay factor of 3 per cent. for FY 1985/86 to the provisional distribution of grant announced in October. The grants of all universities have therefore been reduced on a pro-rata basis.

5. From the total recurrent grant the Committee is making provision for the following:—

	£m
(a) rates: provision for the October 1985 and June 1986 instalments of local authority rates grant (assuming a 6 per cent. increase in each of the financial years 1985/86 and 1986/87)	84
(b) capital-in-recurrent grants (see para 13)	6
(c) new blood and IT appointments to be made in 1985	5
(d) the cost of the Overseas Research Students Awards Scheme and of the Universities' Statistical Record etc.	5
(e) computer facilities for teaching	3
(f) items still under consideration (see para 9)	21

6. The amount to be distributed is therefore £1,185m. This includes provision for:—

(a) restructuring initiatives and new developments approved over the last two years or so, which are additional to those for which provision is now included in the baseline distribution: details are given in Annex B; and

(b) all new blood and IT posts approved by the Committee in the first two years of these programmes, provision being at the rate of £22,000 for each new blood (science) and IT post and £16,500 for each new blood (arts) post; universities are reminded that in addition to covering the full salary costs of the post holders, the annual grant for each new blood and IT post (which is added to the baseline recurrent grant although not separately identified after the first year) is also intended to contribute to the general research costs and overheads of the departments in which the appointments are made (see Circular letter 1/83).

7. Rates grant will continue to be paid separately because the increases in local authority rates still have an unpredictable and differential effect on individual universities. I expect to announce the Committee's decision on the rates grant before the end of July. Assistance in 1985-86 with the financing of capital projects costing less than £1m will again be made in the form of an allocation of recurrent grant additional to the block distribution, earmarked for capital purposes (see paras 10-12 below).

8. The sum of £3m set aside for computer facilities for teaching in universities will supplement the support being given by the Computer Board for Universities and Research Councils under an initiative begun by FY 1984-85 and continuing in 1985-86. The Committee will be consulting the Computer Board on the use of the £3m and more details will be given about this in due course.

9. The Committee is concerned about the effect on universities' financial circumstances, both of the continuing squeeze on recurrent grant and of the variety of demands from Government for increased expenditure in particular areas. In the face of these pressures, the Committee has decided to distribute on a selective basis the uncommitted balance of £21m. (£4m of the £25m referred to in Circular Letter 14/84 have now been committed, mainly for computer facilities for teaching.) It is not yet ready to take final decisions about the disbursement of this sum but the following are among the possibilities which it is considering:

(a) start-up expenditure to provide for an increase in the number of students in computer science and some aspects of engineering, if the Committee can obtain assurances that the level of grant in future years will be adequate to sustain such an initiative
(b) once-and-for-all expenditure (for example on library automation) which will lead to recurrent savings in future years
(c) encouragement of post-experience vocational education
(d) encouragement of industrially-sponsored research
(e) an increase in the amount already allocated for computer facilities for teaching
(f) an increase in the unit of recourse for particular subjects.

I shall be writing to give further details later in the year.

10. The same arrangements will be made for paying monthly instalments of recurrent grant in 1985-86 as in 1984-85.

CAPITAL IN RECURRENT ALLOCATIONS

11. In their replies to Circular Letter 16/83 of 1 November 1983, universities made clear that they valued the allocations of capital funds in recurrent grant for projects costing less than £1m, but would find them more useful if they could plan on a regular sum being available for the purpose. The Committee has therefore decided in future to allocate the greater part of the available funds with the rest of the recurrent grant. The amounts included are shown in Annex A.

12. The total (including the earmarked allocation) up to which universities may fund new capital projects from general income has been increased to 4 per cent. of recurrent grant, plus any part of the 3 per cent. allowance that was not used in any of the three preceding academic years. Expenditure in excess of this requires the prior agreement of the Committee.

13. The Committee has retained £6m from which to support specific projects costing less than £1m. Special allocations will in future be limited to large projects (normally costing not less than £200K) of exceptional urgency which universities could not reasonably be expected to finance from general income under the arrangements set out in the preceding paragraph. In general the Committee will be prepared to consider making special allocations to large projects only where the university is already committing a significant sum from general income to such projects. By "significant" the Committee means a sum equivalent to at least 2 per cent. of the university's annual recurrent grant for two years, including the year in which the special allocation is sought. Priority will be given to projects which show a saving in recurrent expenditure.

STUDENT NUMBERS

14. In its Strategy Advice the Committee described the financial difficulties which the universities were facing because the level of grant was not being maintained in real terms. The main reason for this was that the Government's pay factor had been less than the actual increases in salaries and wages, but there had also been cuts and unexpected new commitments. All the evidence since then is that, if anything, the universities' difficulties will increase. Although the Committee will review the position again when the Government has produced its Green Paper on the future development of higher education it considers that student numbers must continue to be restrained in line with the existing targets. However the relaxation applied to postgraduate student numbers which was announced in para 16 of Circular Letter 2/84 will continue; and universities' offers to admit additional undergraduates in 1984 and 1985 in response to Circular Letter 19/83, without additional grant, remain acceptable.

OTHER POINTS

15. The Committee is concerned about the decline in the provision of courses in building and related subjects at a time when the demand from industry for graduates in this area is increasing. It would not wish this decline to continue and invites universities to explore ways of securing the viability of such departments through a more comprehensive integration of the discipline with associated subjects such as architecture and building services as well as civil engineering. It further believes that, given the importance of the construction industry in the national economy and its increasing demands for graduates, universities might also try to divert some of the resources now available to civil engineering into the broader field of building engineering.

Yours sincerely

SIR PETER SWINNERTON-DYER

ENCS:

Educational Maintenance Grants

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many school children have received educational maintenance grants for each of the last five years; and what has been the value of those awards in each of the local authorities.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 4 December 1984, c. 85-90]: The value of educational maintenance allowances for the London borough of Sutton for the last five years should read as follows:

Mr. Renton: Yes.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date the British high commission in Sierra Leone received a letter from the Liverpool Eight law centre concerning an application on compassionate grounds for an entry clearance certificate; and when a reply will be sent.

Mr. Renton: The British high commission in Sierra Leone has been unable to trace any recent correspondence from the Liverpool Eight law centre.

UN Decade for Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the non-governmental organisations which will be consulted about the national statement to be prepared for the United Nations End of Decade for Women conference.

Mr. Renton: A list of non-governmental organisations which have participated throughout the work of the groups set up in 1982 in liaison with the Women's National Commission will be published with the groups' reports. These reports will be taken into account in preparing our national statement to the conference.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the financial and administrative support made available to each of the United Kingdom's working groups on the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Renton: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has made £200 available to each of 13 working groups to help meet the administrative costs of preparing their reports.

The Cabinet Office, through the Women's National Commission, has provided conference facilities and support services and has undertaken research work for the groups.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the grants made available to groups, individuals and research organisations to enable them to provide research necessary to answer the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Renton: The work needed for the United Kingdom's response to the United Nations questionnaire was undertaken by the Government. Consequently, no such grants were made.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures have been taken within his Department to implement articles 91, 98, 101 and 105 of the 1975 world plan of action for the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Renton: Article 91

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is an equal opportunity employer. There are no barriers to employment on the grounds of sex or marital status and this is reflected in our recruitment literature. At the end of 1984 women formed 36 per cent. of the total complement of the Diplomatic Service.

Article 98

This article is not strictly applicable to the Government. Nevertheless, both male and female officers within the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are treated in exactly the same way as regards work and promotion in all sectors, including management and policy-making.

Article 101

On 9 February 1984 we announced a programme of action on women within the Civil Service consisting of 70 items covering the whole spectrum of equal opportunities issues and including measures for part-time work and flexible working hours. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has appointed equal opportunities officers to provide a focal point for the promulgation of these policies. The equal opportunities officers are in regular contact with the trade unions.

Article 105

This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office follows national practice in such matters.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to promote policies designed to achieve the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women: and what budget has been allocated for this.

Mr. Renton: We are fully committed to elminating discrimation and to promoting equal opportunities for women which we see as the most important objectives of the United Nations Decade. We have taken a range of initiatives during the Decade which contribute to these objectives. No fixed proportion of public funds has been allocated for this.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to evaluate the extent to which the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women have been achieved in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We are evaluating progress made in the achievement in this country of these goals as part of our preparations for the world conference of the Decade for Women, to be held in July in Nairobi. We shall be presenting a full report to the conference.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what research Her Majesty's Government commissioned prior to Her Majesty's Government's answering the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he has any plans to evaluate the extent to which the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women have been achieved; and if he will publish his findings;

(2) what steps he is taking to promote policies designed to achieve the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women; and what budget he has allocated to this;

(3) what research he commissioned prior to Her Majesty's Government answering the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Renton: The United Nations questionnaire sought essentially factual information, which was obtained from the relevant Government Departments.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Revenue Departments (Enforcement Powers)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is yet in a position to announce the publication date of the final volume of the report of the committee under the chairmanship of Lord Keith of Kinkel which has been inquiring into the enforcement powers of the Revenue Departments; and when a decision will be made on the implementation of the proposals made in that volume.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have received volume 4 of the report, dealing with customs, excise duties and car tax. It will be published on 13 February 1985.

I welcome volume 4 of the report and I am grateful to the committee for its thorough examination of the enforcement powers of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and for the full consideration it has given to the representations and evidence which it received. The report will require careful study and I shall want to allow time for full discussion of the important issues that it has raised. A decision on implementation will be taken in the light of the views expressed on the committee's proposals for change and I would now like to invite interested parties to submit their comments on volume 4 direct to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. I would hope that they will do this by 30 September.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures comparing the estimated net costs, after savings on means-tested benefit expenditure of (a) raising tax thresholds for married couples to equal the supplementary benefit scale rate for a family with four children aged four years, six years, 12 years and 15 years, plus £25 per week to allow for housing costs and (b) raising tax thresholds for married couples to equal the supplementary scale rate for a married couple, plus £25 to cover housing costs, and simultaneously increasing child benefit to equal the supplementary benefit scale rates for children, assuming in each case that the other personal income tax allowances are moved up in line.

Mr. Moore: If income tax allowances for 1985-86 were set, as specified, in relation to the supplementary benefit scale rates now current, the net costs in a full year at forecast 1985-86 levels of income are estimated at (a) £15 billion and (b) £4¾ billion. These costs are relative to indexation of allowances and thresholds by 4·6 per cent. and assume that relief for mortgage interest would continue on the present basis. The level of the married man's allowance in each case would be (a) £6,165 and (b) £3,675.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate, for each financial year since 1979-80, the costs of raising (a) the tax threshold and (b) the tax bands above the rate of inflation;

(2) if he will estimate the loss to the Exchequer in each year since 1979-80 resulting from the abolition of the higher-rate bands for income tax;

(3) if he will estimate the costs to the Exchequer each year since 1979-80 of the reduction in the basic rate from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 310]: If the 1978-79 income tax allowances and thresholds were indexed to 1984-85 levels by reference to the statutory formula and applied to the 1984-85 income tax base, the direct revenue effect would be an additional yield of about £4·3 billion in a full year.

The levels of the main allowances and thresholds, compared with the actual 1984-85 values, would be:

Personal allowances	Indexed 1978-79 regime £	1984-85 £

Investment Income Surcharge: Indexed 1978-79 regime

Bands of net investment income (£) Non-aged	Aged	Rate of Surcharge (percentage)
0—3,100	0—4,600	Exempt
3,101—4,200	4,601—5,600	10
over 4,200	over 5,600	15

Investment income surcharge was abolished in 1984-85.

Taking the 1984-85 income tax base as given, the direct revenue effects of reinstating the indexed 1978-79 tax regime can be broken down, as follows:

	Yield(+)/ Cost(−) £ million
Reductions in personal allowances	+1,590
Reintroduction of reduced rate band at 25p	−1,550
Increase in basic rate of 3p	+2,410
Reduction in basic rate limit of £800	+60
Changes in higher rate thresholds up to 60 per cent.	+400
Reintroduction of higher rates above 60 per cent.	+660
Reintroduction of investment income surcharge	+730
Total	4,300

In the table above, the effect of each change has been calculated on the assumption that each of the changes which precede it has already been made.

It is not possible to determine what incomes in 1984-85 would have been if the 1978-79 tax allowances and thresholds had been in force (after indexation) over all the intervening years.

The provision of similar information for earlier years would involve disproportionate cost.

HMSO Bookshops

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it remains Government policy to try to maintain a comparable standard of service at each of Her Majesty's Stationery Office bookshops in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes, as far as practicable. In particular, the tight time scales applying to the printing and publishing of many parliamentary papers means that they are usually available at Her Majesty's Stationery Office's bookshop at High Holborn sooner than at their other bookshops. In addition, the London bookshop serves a much bigger market than the other bookshops and can therefore maintain much larger stocks.

Tax Yields

Mr. Mudd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give (a) the actual yield in 1983-84 and (b) his latest estimate of the 1984-85 yield from the following (i) fuel duty, (ii) vehicle excise duty, (iii) car tax, (iv) value added tax on vehicle sales and (v) value added tax on sales of petrol and derv.

Mr. Hayhoe: Estimates are as follows:

	(£ million)
	1983-84	1984-85
Road fuel duties	5,414	5,850
Vehicle excise duty	1,997	2,130
Car tax	703	700
VAT on vehicle sales	1,450	1,550
VAT on petrol and derv	875	1,000

Development Land Tax Act 1976

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to permit agreements under section 18 of the Development Land Tax Act 1976 to be revocable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: No legislation is necessary, for the existing notification procedure is not irrevocable. An owner who wishes to notify a further project within the qualifying time may already do so.

VAT (Live Theatre and Music)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sums have been collected by the Treasury resulting from the imposition of value added tax on live theatre and music in each single year since 1979; and what considerations he has given as to its abolition.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the revenue from VAT charged on admissions to theatres, concerts and similar live entertainment was of the order of:

	£ million
1979	15
1980	25
1981	25
1982	30
1984	35

The Government considered the VAT treatment of the theatre and other live entertainment in the context of the third report from the Education, Science and Arts Committee (published March 1982) but concluded that it would be inconsistent with their policy for the tax to introduce a special relief in this area.

Pensions and Publications (Taxation)

Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received concerning (a) any tax changes in pension arrangements and (b) the possible imposition of value added tax on publications.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Economic Policies

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the economic indications by which he judges the success of his economic policies.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Budget Rebates)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if any part of the rebates payable to the United Kingdom by the European Economic Community under the Fontainebleau agreement will be in the form of project finance.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. Under Fontainebleau, the United Kingdom's EC contributions will be reduced by abatement of our VAT payments.

Investment Income Surcharge

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report his latest estimate of the costs to the Exchequer of the abolition of the investment income surcharge in 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 314]: The direct revenue cost in respect of liability to investment income surcharge which would have arisen for 1984-85 is estimated at £30 million in 1984-85 and £280 million in 1985-86.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what level per week child benefit could be raised if the married man's tax allowance were reduced to the rate of a single man's for men below retirement age and the savings allocated to raising the levels of child benefit.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 592]: If the changes had applied in 1984-85, the increase in child benefit would have been about £5·50 per week. It has been assumed that scale rates of supplementary benefit for dependent children would also have been increased by a similar amount.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Gas and Electricity Boards (Chairmen)

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairmen of the gas and electricity boards; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Whitney: We maintain frequent contact with the British Gas Corporation and the Electricity Council and electricity boards about ways of helping people on low incomes to avoid disconnection of their fuel supply. Recently I met the financial director of the London electricity board to discuss ways of improving liaison.

Board and Lodging Regulations

13. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the Social Security Advisory Committee to be able to report on the proposed changes in board and lodging allowances.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend received the Social Security Advisory Committee's report on these proposals last week.

21. Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has now received about his proposals to change the regulations with regard to board and lodging allowances.

Mr. Newton: We have received a large number of representations about the proposals directly, and the Social Security Advisory Committee has received over 500.

26. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his most up-to-date estimate of the savings he expects to make as a result of the proposed changes in board and lodgings allowances.

Mr. Whitney: I would refer the hon. Member for my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 5 December 1984, at column 226.

36. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any representations from charitable organisations providing board and lodging in support of the proposals in the draft regulations.

Mr. Whitney: A large number of representations have been made to us and to the Social Security Advisory Committee about the proposed changes. Many of these supported the general framework of the proposals in respect of residential and nursing homes, whilst expressing concern about particular details.

48. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in the light of the representations received, he expects to be able to go ahead on time with the proposed changes in board and lodging allowances.

Mr. Whitney: We do not expect the representations made to the Social Security Advisory Committee to affect the timetable we have proposed.

Nuclear Burst

14. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what effect a one megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles would have on the equipment and resources in his care.

Mr. John Patten: The resulting nuclear electromagnetic pulse could damage electronic and electrical equipment.

53. Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electronic-magnetic pulse.

Mr. John Patten: This is a general issue which is being considered interdepartmentally.

Unemployment Benefit

15. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much unemployed people are allowed to earn per day before losing benefit.

Mr. Whitney: An unemployed person can earn up to £2 per day before losing his unemployment benefit for that day. He can earn £4 per week before supplementary benefit is affected. Any excess over £4 reduces supplementary benefit by an equivalent amount.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons in Wales were debarred, during 1984, from receiving unemployment insurance benefit; and how this compares with figures for each of the five preceding years.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 306]: I regret that the figures for 1984 are not yet available because of the effects of the recently ended Newcastle computer strike. However, the information for 1983 and the five preceding years is given in the table. This shows the numbers of unemployed claimants not receiving unemployment benefit on the day of the count in November each year, except 1981, for which the only available statistics relate to February. Numbers in column B include those claimants whose entitlement had not been determined or who had not completed their three-day waiting period, as well as those whose benefit was initially disallowed because of, for example, the voluntary unemployment provisions; some of these claimants would eventually receive unemployment benefit.

This information is taken from the "Quarterly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants", copies of which (from 1980 onwards) are in the Library.

Year	A Unemployment benefit exhausted	B Other reasons	C Total
1983	59,200	55,100	114,300
1982	61,500	50,900	112,400
1981	30,300	32,100	62,400
1980	26,700	33,200	59,900
1979	22,400	22,600	45,000
1978	23,300	25,100	48,400

Supplementary Benefit

16 Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the level of allowances payable for clothing, beds and bedding to pensioners and people on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: The amounts allowable for clothing and bedding are set out in schedules 1 and 2 to the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1981 (as amended) which are reproduced as appendix 7 of the supplementary benefit "S" manual—copies of both are in the Library. They are based on the results of an annual empirical study of prices obtaining in national chain stores and high street shops, and mail order catalogues. Awards for beds and mattresses are normally based on the cost of a locally obtainable new item.

40. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any recent representations in relation to entitlement to single payments of supplementary benefit in the context of an industrial dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have not received any recent representations on this topic.

47. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence he has about the number of students drawing supplementary benefit and studying under the 21-hour or 12-hour rules.

Mr. Whitney: Records are not kept centrally but there are indications that the number has increased since the Youthaid organisation estimated a figure of about 10,000 in 1982-83.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the capital limit at which an individual is not eligible for supplementary benefit; and when the figure was last reviewed.

Mr. Whitney: The capital limit above which supplementary benefit is not payable is £3,000. It was raised to this level from 21 November 1983.

Mental Health Act 1983

17. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the implementation of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Implementation of the Mental Health Act is continuing satisfactorily.

General Medical Practitioners

18. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many general medical practitioners there are now compared with 1979; and what difference this has made to the average list size.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At 1 October 1979, in England, the number of unrestricted principals in general medical practice was 21,357 and the average list size 2,286. The corresponding figures for 1 October 1983 are 23,254 and 2,116.

Thornton View Hospital, Bradford

19. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of Thornton View hospital in Bradford.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend decided in April 1984 that this unsatisfactory building should be closed and its services transferred to other hospitals in Bradford. Bradford health authority has stopped admitting patients and when the weather and other circumstances permit are transferring patients to other hospitals as suitable places can be made available.

Limited List Prescribing

20. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services from how many general practitioners he has received representations over the past three months concerning his proposals to restrict the drugs available on the National Health Service; and, of these, how many have been in support of his proposals and how many opposed to them.

29. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further representations he has received regarding his proposal to introduce a restricted list for National Health Service prescriptions.

38. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of representations his Department has now received in response to his proposals to limit the prescribing of certain drugs and medicines on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Members and my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, Central, (Mr. Fisher) and my hon. Friend the Member fof Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), earlier today.

45. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received from pharmacists concerning his proposals with regard to drug prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received representations from a wide range of individuals and organisations, including pharmacists and bodies representing the profession. We are considering all these views carefully.

55. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress made in his consultations on his recent proposals on the use of drugs in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The consultation period has now ended and we have received many helpful suggestions and comments from a wide variety of sources. We are now considering these comments and will announce our conclusions and the final content of the limited list as soon as possible.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints he has received about the way in which doctors have represented to elderly patients the nature of his plans for limited list prescribing; and if he has any plans to discuss this matter with family practitioner committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Many people share the Government's concern at the way in which some doctors have alarmed their patients, including the elderly, with misleading statements about the consequences of limiting the drugs available under the National Health Service. I have made it quite clear to the British Medical Association that I regard its advice to doctors on this form of campaigning as unethical and falling short of desirable professional standards of behaviour. I have no plans to discuss the matter with family practitioner committees.

Sick Pay Scheme

22. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by what method he is consulting employers on the extension of the sick pay scheme to 28 weeks.

Mr. Newton: The Department issued a consultation paper on 20 December 1984. Copies of the paper were sent to the Confederation of British Industry and to other organisations representing employers' interests.

51. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the savings to employers that will result from them no longer having to pay national insurance contributions on payments under the statutory sick pay scheme.

Mr. Newton: We now estimate that compensation to employers for the cost of secondary contributions on statutory sick pay will amount to some £60 million in 1985-86.

NHS (Efficiency)

23. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the current level of efficiency within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No, but I am satisfied that substantial advances have been made over the past five years which have increased efficiency in the NHS. We are taking steps to ensure that this trend continues and develops, leading to further improvements in patient services.

Elderly Persons (Private Homes)

24. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received in relation to registration of private homes for the elderly.

Mr. John Patten: Representations we have received range from criticisms that the new registration procedures are not tough enough to complaints that local authorities are applying them to inflexibly. As the new regulations came into operation as recently as 1 January it is too soon to judge their effectiveness, but we are keeping the position under review.

Draughtproofing Grants

25. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the number of draughtproofing grants he estimated to be unclaimed by individuals who are eligible for them; whether he proposes any publicity to increase awareness of the right to claim this grant; and whether he has any plans to extend the scope or amounts of these grants.

Mr. Whitney: No information is available on the number of unclaimed supplementary benefit single payments for draughtproofing. These payments are publicised in leaflets issued by our Department and by the Energy Efficiency Office and we are currently working together on further publicity material. There are no plans at present to amend the regulations relating to single payments for draughtproofing, although the whole question of special expenses of this type is something which we are looking at following the review of the supplementary benefit scheme.

Social Services Departments (Grant Allocations)

27. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any representations from local authorities about the effect of the rate support grant allocations to local social services departments upon their ability properly to fulfil their statutory duties.

Mr. John Patten: Although we have received no representations in the exact terms of the hon. Member's question, we have received representations from or on behalf of a few local authorities about the possible effects of limitations in the total resources available to them on their capacity to carry out their statutory duties.

Clothing (Single Payment)

28. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the recent submission by his officers to an appeal tribunal hearing an application for a single payment for clothing which suggested that children could be kept at home if no such grant were made.

Mr. Whitney: Guidance on the interpretation of the supplementary benefit regulations, including advice on submissions to social security appeal tribunals, is a matter for the Chief Adjudication Officer, while decisions on individual claims are made, in the first instance, by local adjudication officers, subject to the right of appeal.

Single payments of supplementary benefit can be made for, among other items, children's clothing and footwear under regulation 30 of the Single Payments Regulations where in the adjudication officer's opinion the absence of such a payment would lead to serious damage or serious risk to health or safety. Guidance on the application of regulation 30 is in paragraph 7546 of the "S" manual—a copy of which is in the Library. This advises that the fact that a child (whatever its state of health) has to stay away from school for a period while steps are taken to obtain the item will not in itself constitute a serious risk to health. It is not the intention that a child should remain at home indefinitely if the means of satisfying the need are not available from another source. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind I would be grateful if he would let me have the details.

Organ Transplants

30. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding organ transplants.

Mr. John Patten: The Government support organ transplantation, which can relieve suffering and prolong life. The transplantation of kidneys and of corneas are well established and very successful procedures, and good results are now also being obtained with heart and with liver transplants. The provision of facilities for organ transplantation is the responsibility of health authorities, but the Department has made substantial grants to the heart transplant programmes at Papworth and Harefield hospitals and to the liver transplant programme at Addenbrooke's hospital; liver transplantation will be funded as a supra regional service from April of this year. The Department also plays a major part in increasing public awareness of the benefits of organ transplantation and in promoting the donor card scheme; a publicity campaign was launched in February last year and has proved very successful. We shall be considering shortly whether further initiatives are needed to maintain its momentum. In the first nine months after the start of the kidney campaign kidney transplants increased by 35 per cent.

Surrogate Motherhood

31. Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reach a conclusion concerning legislation on surrogate motherhood.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 14 January, at column 63.

Regional Funding

32. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the progress being made to reduce the variations in regional funding as recommended by the Resource Allocation Working Party White Paper.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. The gap between the best and worst funded regions has narrowed from 22 per cent. in 1979-80 to 15 per cent. in the 1985-86 allocations announced on 20 December 1984 in the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), at columns 260-61.

Cot Deaths

33. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he intends to make to the Knowelden report about cot deaths.

Mr. John Patten: I would refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on 1 February, at column 361.

Kidney Patients (Treatment)

34. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how soon he expects there to be commonality in the treatment of kidney patients in all the health regions of England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: The levels of treatment facilities provided for kidney patients are a matter for health authorities. As stated in my reply to my hon. Friend on 28 January, at columns 62-63, all regional health authorities have agreed to accept a target of treating at least 40 new renal patients per million population by 1987, irrespective of their current levels of treatment facilities which vary significantly. I hope, however, that these targets will be exceeded and that levels of service provision will continue to expand after 1987. Services in Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Elderly Persons (Health Needs)

35. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision the Government are planning to meet the health needs of the elderly over the next three years.

Mr. John Patten: Over the next three years we shall spend an extra £2·4 billion on the National Health Service, and elderly people will benefit as major users of almost all health care services. The great majority of elderly people live at home and the central objective of all our policies for their care is to enable them to continue to do so for as long as possible. For this they need good community health services backed up by ready access to hospital facilities, especially the geriatric and psychogeriatric specialties. The National Health Service annual report 1984 described steady improvements since 1978 in all these services. As my right hon. Friend said in the foreword to the report, we intend that these improvements should continue.

Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital Stanmore

37. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the future of the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital, Stanmore, Middlesex.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Between April and July last year we received 27 letters from hon. Members and approximately 72 letters from orthopaedic surgeons and members of the public expressing concern about the future of the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital, both its London and Stanmore branches. Since November 1984 we have received six letters from hon. Members and one from a member of the public expressing similar concern specifically about Stanmore. My hon. Friend has asked to meet me to discuss this subject and I have agreed to do so.

Abortions

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps have been taken to reduce the delays in the National Health Service which cause late abortions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Following the publication last year of research by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists we are acting on its recommendations in several ways. In particular we shall be discussing with the National Health Service how some of the problems identified in the report can be tackled and consulting the Department of Education and Science on its recommendations about more counselling and health education for young people. We also commend the report's recommendations about the importance of early detection of pregnancy. This is one of the important messages in the first report of the Maternity Services Advisory Committee which we published last year and commended to health authorities.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of abortions per thousand girls at each age performed in England and Wales to resident girls aged 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 years, respectively, together with the rate of abortions for this age group for the years 1968 to 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is shown in the table:

Legal abortions: Rates per 1,000 population for girls aged 11-16 for 1968-1983, England and Wales, Residents

Beds (Single Payments)

41. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice is given to adjudication officers concerning single payments for beds; and whether this advice has recently been changed.

Mr. Whitney: Guidance to adjudication officers concerning single payments of supplementary benefit for beds is contained in paragraphs 7192 and 7195 of the "S" manual — a copy of which is in the Library. Adjudication officers are required to base any award they make for beds or mattresses on the cost of new items (unless the claimant is a squatter) although, if a claimant has already acquired or made arrangements for a secondhand item but not paid for it, the award will be based on the actual cost of the item. The cost of delivery can also be met. I understand that the Chief Adjudication Officer has not issued any new advice recently on this subject.

Heating Costs (Severe Weather Payments)

42. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the way in which single needs payments towards extra heating costs are applied; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In addition to views expressed in the House we have received about 120 letters and one petition signed by about 100 people this year, including about 45 letters from hon. and right hon. Members, about the way in which payments for extra fuel in periods of exceptionally severe weather are given. As my hon. Friend said in his reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 18 January, at column 261, the Chief Adjudication Officer will be looking at the guidance he has issued on the interpretation of the regulation governing entitlement to these payments in the light of experience. More generally, we are looking at the provision for meeting special expenses of this sort in the context of the supplementary benefit review.

46. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with this winter's operation of exceptionally severe weather payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 18 January, at column 261.

Far Eastern Prisoners of War (Pension)

43. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will introduce a service pension or award, irrespective of any disability pension, for surviving far eastern prisoners of war.

Mr. Whitney: Whilst we have the greatest respect and sympathy for those who were prisoners-of-war in the far east, it would not be appropriate to introduce a pension or award for them solely because of that imprisonment. Those who suffered disablement as a result of service in the armed forces, including time spent as a prisoner-of-war, are eligible for a disablement pension under the war pensions scheme. Claims from ex-far eastern prisoners-of-war are given special and sympathetic consideration because of the particular circumstances of their captivity.

Mortgage Defaulters

44. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special arrangements have been made by his Department to assist mortgage defaulters.

Mr. Whitney: Special arrangements exist to help borrowers who are receiving supplementary benefit. No additional benefit is available in respect of arrears but if a claimant's supplementary benefit assessment includes an amount for mortgage interest that sum, together with £1·45 towards the arrears, may be deducted from his benefit and paid on his behalf to the lender. This may be done if:

the claimant is in arrears because, in the opinion of the adjudication officer, he has failed to budget, and he has not paid two of the mortgage payments due in the preceding twelve weeks, and in the opinion of the adjudication officer, it is in the claimant's interests to institute direct payment.

The adjudication officer may also institute direct payment even if these criteria are not satisfied if in his opinion it is in the overriding interests of the claimant or his family to do so. No help may be given with mortgage capital repayments.

Cystic Fibrosis (Manchester)

49. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of treatment for cystic-fibrosis sufferers at the Royal Manchester children's hospital.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 21 January, at column 347, to which I have nothing to add.

Severe Disablement Allowance

50. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the change of those previously receiving non-contributory invalidity pension and housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension to severe disablement allowance has been successfully accomplished; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Yes. I would refer my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend's reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 21 January, at column 325.

Social Security Reviews

52. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to report to the House the results of his four reviews into provision for retirement, help with housing costs, benefits for children and young people and supplementary benefit, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Members for Coventry, South East (Mr. Nellist) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) earlier today.

NHS (Maternity Units)

54. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether it is his policy to support the continuance of the smaller National Health Service maternity units in peripheral areas.

Mr. John Patten: It remains our view that women should be encouraged to have their babies in hospitals which can offer the whole range of services necessary to deal with emergencies that may arise. It is for health authorities to plan the provision of services locally, having regard for the views of users; the social or geographical need for units at particular locations; the use made of different units; the existence of selective booking policies; and the availability of medical, midwifery, and ambulance services. If proposals to close a small maternity unit come to Ministers for decision, we will consider a case on its merits, having regard to all these factors.

Prestwich Hospital, Manchester (Drugs Dependency Unit)

56. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last had discussions with the North-West regional health authority about the drugs dependency unit at Prestwich hospital, Manchester.

Mr. John Patten: We have had no discussions with the North Western regional health authority on this matter. However, officials have had a number of discussions with the drugs dependency unit at Prestwich hospital, where we are funding research and two projects under the Government's central funding initiative on drug misuse.

NHS (Capital Schemes)

57. Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many major capital schemes in the National Health Service have been started on site since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: In England, 47 major hospital schemes each costing over £5 million have been started on site since 1979.

Wheelchairs

58. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to supply battery powered wheelchairs on National Health Service prescription for the chronically disabled.

Mr. Newton: I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) on 5 December 1984, at column 221.

AIDS (Blood Donors)

59. Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes in response to an article by Dr. Sheena Meredith in the 10 January issue of Medical News, a copy of which has been sent to him, reporting that as recently as 19 December 1984 some transfusion centres were not issuing donors with the leaflet explaining that homosexuals should not give blood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have told regional health authorities to ensure that our revised leaflet "AIDS—Important New Advice for Blood Donors" is given on an individual basis to all donors. Stocks of this leaflet have been issued to regional transfusion centres.

Health Authorities (Membership)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many members on (a) Waltham Forest district health authority and (b) North-East Thames regional health authority are women; what proportion this is of the total members of the authority; and whether he is satisfied that the current level of female representation is in accordance with the aims of his Department's circular HC(81)6 of May 1981.

(2) how many ethnic minority representatives are members of (a) Waltham Forest district health authority and (b) North-East Thames regional health authority; what proportion this is of the total number of members on the authority; and whether he is satisfied that the current level of ethnic minority representation is in accordance with the aims of his Department's circular HC(81)6 of May 1981;

(3) how many members of (a) Waltham Forest district health authority and (b) North-East Thames regional health authority are over 65 years of age; what proportion this is of the total members of the authority; whether their appointments are exceptional in accordance with his Department's circular HC(81)6 of May 1981; and if he will supply the reasons in each case for such exceptional appointment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Five members of North-East Thames regional health authority are women and one member is over 65. This represents 31 per cent. and 6 per cent. respectively of the authority's membership. So far as we are aware, no member of the regional health authority is a member of an ethnic minority.

We do not appoint members as representatives of particular groups, but we seek to ensure that members corporately cover the interests of the whole community.

The circular to which the hon. Member refers gives guidance on the appointment of members to district health authorities. My right hon. Friend does not make these appointments. They are the responsibility of the regional health auhority.

Viruses (Genetic Engineering)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the purpose of research into the genetic engineering of viruses at St. George's hospital, London, funded by the centre for applied microbiology and Research, Porton Down.

Mr. John Patten: We are not aware of this research. However, work is being undertaken by St. George's hospital, in collaboration with the centre for applied microbiology and research and funded by the Wellcome Trust, into cytomegalovirus — which is one cause of congenital malformation in children. The long-term objective is to develop an effective vaccine.

Porton Down (Research)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, Porton Down, is involved in research in collaboration with others at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine into the effects of Lassa fever, Congo and Crimea haemorrhagic disease and Rift Valley fever; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: These are serious diseases of international importance, occurring mainly in the Third world. Work relating to the cure and prevention of such diseases is part of the international role of the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine and of the Public Health Laboratory Service Board, which is responsible for the centre for applied microbiology and research.

Residential Homes (Clothing Allowances)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list those local authorities who use the differential between the personal allowance element in the supplementary pension in the local authority homes and the higher sum paid to those in private homes to buy clothing second-hand for their residents; and if he will list those local autorities which have a policy of only providing a choice of new clothing to residents in their residential homes and those local authorities who have no policy on this matter;

(2) if he will list for the latest available year (a) those local authorities in England which made budgetary provision for clothing allowances for residents of pensionalble age who are in local authority or private residential care homes, (b) how much each of those authorities budgeted and (c) the amount this represented per resident in receipt of a supplementary pension.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not held centrally. Under section 21(5) of the National Assistance Act 1948 local authorities are liable to provide all necessary amenities and requisities, including personal clothing, for those residents whom they support in residential accomodation, including sponsored residents in private and voluntary homes. It is for that reason that the personal needs allowance at the part III rate is lower than that for other state supported residents in private or voluntary homes, who are expected to buy their own clothing and footwear.

Women (Ill-treatment)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women seek medical aid each year for injuries which can be attributed to ill-treatment.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally.

Ambulance Services

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many ambulance journeys were undertaken in the last year for which figures are available; and what percentage of these were for non-emergency purposes.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available in the form requested. The table shows the number of National Health Service patients carried by road in England in 1983 by type of service and distinguishes between emergency cases and other cases. In addition, the ambulance services arranged for the transport of some 18,000 patients by rail or air in 1983 but no information is available on the number of these which were non-emergency cases.

* "Patient journey" is the carriage of one patiem in one direction.

Children (Poisoning)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last 10 years the number of children who have been fatally poisoned in the United Kingdom; and if he will disaggregate the figures by whatever information on age grouping that is available to him.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is given in the tables:

Liverpool Area Health Authority (Privatisation)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning proposed privatisation of services by the Liverpool health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received no recent representations on competitive tendering by the Liverpool health authority.

Patients (Treatment Costs)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the cost of unnecessary investigations ordered by doctors, of unnecessary operations carried out by surgeons and the continuing visits to out-patient departments by patients who are seen by junior doctors for no good reason; and if he will take steps to ensure that more patients are treated by senior doctors when they are referred to hospital.

Mr. John Patten: The need for, type and frequency of investigations and any operations considered necessary for the care or treatment of National Health Service patients are matters for the clinical judgment of the doctors responsible for each case. Those decisions will require an individual assessment of each patient and will be dependent on their condition at any one time, their symptoms or illness, and the clinician's requirements for information or diagnosis.

It is similarly for the consultant responsible for each case to determine how any treatment should be carried out; by whom, and the frequency and timing of any follow-up out-patient clinic attendances. These decisions will also be tailored to the individual needs of each patient seen.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the present hospital waiting lists in the west midlands region for patients requiring operations for cataract, hip replacement, hernia and hysterectomy.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority who may be able to provide the requested information.

Hospital Treatment (Payment)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to ensure that road accident victims, private patients and overseas visitors pay for their treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 14 December 1984, at column 668, to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

UN Decade for Women

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures he has taken to implement articles 111, 112, 117 and 132 of the 1975 world plan of action for the Decade for Women.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The concepts outlined in articles 111, 112 and 117 are implicit in the organisation of health services in this country, and are reflected in guidance issued by our Department. The implementation of article 132 is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the research he has commissioned on the subject of women's health subsequent to Her Majesty's Government's reply to the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he is satisfied with the range of childcare facilities described in Her Majesty's Government's answer to question A3.2.6 of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will revise Her Majesty's Government's response to question B1.1 of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire, in view of the deaths recorded among women due to cancer of the breast.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are currently sponsoring a major research programme to evaluate the effectiveness of breast screening for early detection of cancer. The preliminary results of this research are expected in 1988, and it would not be appropriate to revise the response to question B1.1 of part II of the United Nations' questionnaire until then.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the extent of women's participation in decision-making in the health services has altered since Her Majesty's Government's response to questions B4.1 and B4.2 of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire was sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

Doctors (Prescribing Habits)

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough of 7 February, to what percentage level above the local average level the word "significantly" applies; and what is the average saving per general practitioner, at 1984 prices, per annum in each of the next two succeeding years after the general practitioners have received the detailed analyses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Detailed analyses are prepared on doctors whose prescribing costs are 25 per cent. or more above the local average. These doctors are visited by our regional medical officers who discuss prescribing practice and related topics with them. It is not possible to identify actual savings, but about 80 per cent. of doctors who are identified and visited in this way subsequently keep their prescribing costs below the limit for special investigation.

Unemployed Persons (Statistics)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take in response to the recent publication of statistics from the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys' longitudinal study showing a 20 per cent. excess of death in unemployed men and their wives.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mental Health Foundation (Exhibition)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Mental Health Foundation to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. John Patten: We are pleased to support such an exhibition and understand that arrangements have been made for 4 to 8 March. We have a high regard for the Mental Health Foundation's work with mentally disordered people.

Birth Statistics

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of births per thousand girls at each age in England and Wales to resident girls aged 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 years, respectively, together with the rate of births to this age group for the years 1968 to 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is given in the table; no detailed analysis of births occurring during 1984 is yet available.

This information on live births cannot be compared to information on the number of abortions performed in England and Wales to resident girls, according to their age at the date of abortion, as provided in my reply to another question today from the hon. Member. This is because live births occur on average nine months after conception whereas abortions take place on average three months after conception. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys has, however, published detailed statistics on abortions and births combined, analysed by the age of the mother at conception, and these can be found in OPCS Monitor No. FM1 84/6 dated 17 July 1984, a copy of which is in the Library.

* The figures may include a very small number of births to girls whose usual residence was outside England and Wales.
† All rates have been based upon estimates of the resident population revised following the 1981 census. Rates per 1,000 have not been calculated where there is only one recorded birth in the age group.
‡ The 1981 figures are estimates based upon a 10 per cent. sample of births; small numbers are therefore subject to particular uncertainty.

Newcastle Office (Dispute)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the cost of the dispute at the Newcastle central office of his Department.

Mr. Fowler: We estimate that additional administrative costs in 1984-85 arising from the dispute and the recovery programme will be some £143 million, representing mainly additional payments to the Post Office and the costs of extra manpower and overtime in local and central social security offices and in unemployment benefit offices. These costs will be offset to some extent by administrative savings elsewhere; the excess will be charged to the Reserve.

The greater part of the costs will be recovered from the national insurance fund, and some allowance was made for this in the estimates given in the report by the Government Actuary on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) (No. 2) Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386). In addition, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for DHSS administrative and miscellaneous services Class XII, Vote 5, will be increased from £720,108,000 by £23,474,000 to £743,582,000.

Postgraduate Hospitals

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how the addition of the specialist postgraduate hospitals to the responsibilities of district health authorities affected the application of the formula of the resource allocation working party to the districts concerned; what will be the position when the protected funding of the hospitals ends; and if he will ensure that there is continued recognition of the national role of these hospitals;

(2) whether any restrictions were placed on the spending of the protected funding of the postgraduate London hospitals now run by district health authorities; whether the protected funding is being fully spent by the hospitals for which it was intended; whether and for which hospitals there has been any borrowing by the district health authority; whether there are plans to maintain the future funding of these specialist hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 475.]: When the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), announced the transfer of the management of four postgraduate hospital groups to district health authorities, he said that for a period of three years their funds would be separately identified in allocations to the regional and district health authorities concerned. The authorities are North-East Thames regional health authority and Bloomsbury health authority for the Royal National Orthopaedic hospitals, the Royal National Throat, Nose and Ear hospitals and the St. Peter's group of hospitals; South-East Thames regional health authority and West Lambeth health authority for St. John's hospital.

Funds have been separately identified by both the Department and the regions for the three years 1982-83, 1983-84, and 1984-85. In the case of St. John's, all the separately identified moneys have been allocated to the hospital.

In the case of the three hospital groups transferred to Bloomsbury, I understand that the district health authority has applied its policy of seeking efficiency savings to those hospitals. This has reduced their revenue by about £700,000 up to 1984-85, but these reductions in revenue have to be considered against the major capital investment already under way for providing the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital with its own discrete accommodation in the Middlesex hospital, the proposed relocation of the St. Peter's group and the proposed development of the Gray's Inn road branch of the Royal National Throat, Nose and Ear hospital.

The special arrangements end, as envisaged, on 31 March. Thereafter normal allocation procedures apply and it will be for the responsible authorities to decide on levels of funding taking account of service needs, resources and maintenance of the hospitals' national postgraduate role. I do not envisage any further form of central protection, but the authorities are free to apply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for supra-regional funding for any part of the hospitals' services if they believe those services meet the criteria for such funding. If the authorities consider that the normal allocation procedures, including those for supra-regional service funding, do not match any special needs of these hospitals, then we will be happy to consider any representations. The overriding aim is to ensure the proper, orderly, integration of the services and management of these postgraduate hospitals into their health authorities in a way that provides maximum benefit to patients and preserves their national role in service, teaching and research. I have every reason to believe that all parties involved will continue to work together to achieve these objectives.

Prescribed Medicines

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the National Health Service budget was represented by the cost of prescribed medicines in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 464]: I regret that the table produced in my earlier reply contained an error. The table should read:

The proportion of total National Health Service expenditure attributable to the cost of drugs (excluding the cost of dispensing) was as follows:

1965	10·1
1970	10·9
1975	7·8
1980	10·3
1984	10·9

Note: Over the period there were small differences in the way the basic information was assembled.

Mental Patients

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the criteria for private hostels being accepted by his Department for receiving ex-mental hospital patients;

(2) if patients in mental hospitals or their families are consulted about transfers from hospitals to private homes.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 530]: Patients leaving mental illness hospitals have the same right as anybody else to choose where to live. When health and social services authorities are planning rehabilitation and aftercare arrangements for a patient prior to discharge, this should be done jointly and in full consultation with the patient and, where appropriate, his or her family. The full range of community resources, including residential care in homes and hostels, should be considered, as should options for financial support through National Health Service, local authority and social security funding.

The Department is not responsible for accepting or rejecting individual homes, but the Registered Homes Act 1984 has tightened the conditions for the registration and inspection of such homes by local social service authorities. We commended a code of practice for residential care, "Home Life", to registration authorities last year; it contains a section specifically about mentally ill people and their rehabilitation.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 607-8]: The tables list, in relation to the four categories identified, the organisations, agencies and parts of our Department which provide services (table one) to the general public or (table two) to private organisations.

In most instances an entry is appropriate under more than one column in respect of different services provided by the body in question or because a particular service may be provided free or in return for payment.

TRANSPORT

Bury St. Edmunds (Roads and Rail)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to evaluate the relative cost-benefits of public investment in (a) roads and (b) railways between London and Bury St. Edmunds.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department would use cost-benefit techniques to appraise schemes where road and rail are direct alternatives, serving exactly the same need. Such cases are rare.

A38 (Saltash Bypass)

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet reached a decision about the proposed A38 road improvements, Saltash bypass section, following the public inquiry; and when it is proposed work will commence.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As my hon. Friend knows, a public inquiry was held last year into this proposal. We have received the inspector's report, and my right hon. Friends hope to be able to announce their decision within the next few weeks.

Dial-a-ride Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement on the discussions he has had with London borough councils about the future status and funding of the dial-a-ride service.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to her reply 12 February 1985, c.114]: Officials from my Department have had a useful preliminary meeting with a number of representatives of the London boroughs about the future of special services such as dial-a-ride.

It is too early to give details about how the operational and funding arrangements will operate in practice. We shall be holding further discussions with the boroughs on how best to ensure that dial-a-ride develops along the most efficient and cost-effective lines.

ENVIRONMENT

Roancabin Ltd.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total value of the contracts involved in the supply of substandard portable accommodation units supplied to the Property Services Agency in Northern Ireland by Roancabin Ltd.

Mr. Gow: The total value of the 11 contracts placed with J. McAvoy Limited (of which I understand Roan Manufacturing Company and Roancabin Limited to be subsidiaries) for the supply of portable accommodation units between 1 January 1983 and 29 September 1984 was £147,875·00 (plus VAT) for 48 units. The total value of the four contracts involving the supply of substandard units was £31,630·00 for 10 units.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action has been taken against Roancabin Ltd. in regard to the supply of substandard portable accommodation units supplied to the Property Services Agency in Northern Ireland by Roancabin Ltd.

Mr. Gow: The manufacturer was required to replace the units at his own cost. Discussions are taking place as to the circumstances in which the omissions occurred.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide full details as to the number of substandard accommodation units supplied to the Property Services Agency in Northern Ireland by Roancabin Ltd.

Mr. Gow: Ten of the units originally supplied did not meet fully the specification.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new jobs were created at each of the enterprise zones in the United Kingdom during 1984.

Sir George Young: Information on employment in enterprise zones is being gathered but is not yet available.

Appleford and Sutton Courtenay (Land Transfer)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will confirm the transfer of land from Appleford and Sutton Courtenay to the town of Didcot as recommended by the Boundary Commission.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend received the Local Government Boundary Commission's report on 15 January, and the objection period does not end until 26 February. If my right hon. Friend decides to implement the proposals, the aim would be to bring the new arrangements into effect on 1 April 1986. My noble Friend Lord Avon is writing to my hon. Friend to explain the procedure.

Housing Associations (Cumbria)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total of housing subsidies paid by the Housing Corporation to each housing association in Cumbria for the last month for which statistics are available.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation finances the development costs of housing association projects within an approved development programme agreed by my right hon. Friend. The value of projects in Cumbria which were approved by the Housing Corporation in January 1985, the latest month for which information is available, is as follows:

	£ thousands
Fair rent (rehabilitation)
Impact Housing Association	24
Low-cost home ownership
Red Dial Housing Association	49
Major repairs	nil

Paints (Damage to Marine Life)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in view of the evidence of damage to marine life and shellfish culture, he intends to ban the use of tributyl tin anti-fouling paints.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has today published a consultation paper covering draft regulations under section 100 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 which would impose controls on the supply and use of such paints. Their general effect would be to prohibit the supply of such paints to private boatowners, and their use by boatbuilders and repairers on boats less than 12 m long. copies of the consultation paper and of the draft regulations have been placed in the Library of the House.

Housing Investment Programme (Allocations)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have made representations to his Department regarding their 1985-86 housing investment programme allocations.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from local authorities about their 1985-86 housing investment programme allocation. The representations have been made in various ways to Ministers and officials—in correspondence, at meetings and during visits. No central record is kept of the number.

North-West Region Emergency Committee

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the powers of the North-West Region Emergency Committee, the names and functions of members of the committee and the circumstances under which the committee would assume these powers.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer to the reply to a similar question which I gave to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyce) on 11 February, at columns 35-36.

Acid Deposition

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any other studies available to him, apart from those being carried out by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, on the relationship between sulphur dioxide emissions and the acidity of rainfall in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom Review Group on Acid Rain, a committee of scientists established by my Department in 1980 to review available data, published a major report on acid deposition in the United Kingdom in December 1983 and continues to meet regularly.

My Department is also funding work at AERE Harwell on chemical reactions producing acid rain and on computer modelling of acid deposition, and at Warren Spring Laboratory on the collection and co-ordination of rainfall composition measurements. In addition, my Department has close ties with the major research programme on acid deposition (both experimental and theoretical) being undertaken by the Meteorological Office and is kept informed of other research results in this field such as the work being carried out by the Freshwater Fisheries Laboratory, Pitlochry on behalf of the Scottish Office.

Pollution

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his answer of 20 December 1984, Official Report, column 270, he will specify the unusual climatic factors in the winter of 1983-84 involved in damage to spruce trees.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the winter of 1983-84 was marked by unusually high winds and frequent alternation of cold and milder weather — conditions which, the Forestry Commission advises, would subject spruce trees to stress. However, it is still too early to say how far weather conditions, rather than other factors, were a cause of the damage prescribed in my reply of 20 December 1984.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the assumptions on which are based his estimates of the number of job losses likely to result from the abolition of the metropolitan county councils.

Sir George Young: The assumptions were set out in my right hon. Friend's statement in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 30 November, at columns 611-14.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecom

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases of multiple application for British Telecom shares were reported to the Government; what court action has been initiated; if the same mechanisms were used in the overseas markets to check for multiple applications; how many were identified; and what procedures were applied to avoid multiple applications being made in the form of separate applications in the United Kingdom and on the overseas markets.

Mr. Butcher: The examination of applications for BT shares under the United Kingdom offer for sale led to some 6,600 applications being rejected as suspected multiple applications. We are considering whether further action would be appropriate in respect of certain of these applications. No similar measures to identify multiple applications were adopted in the overseas share issues because of the different way in which the shares were distributed. The shares were not allocated, as in the United Kingdom, on the basis of direct public applications but were sold by the Government to the overseas underwriters who allocated them to selling groups of investment banks, dealers and brokers. In accordance with market practice it was up to the selling groups, rather than the vendor, to effect the sale and distribution of shares amongst their clients.

Steps were taken to ensure that shares available under the United Kingdom offer for sale were not offered to institutional investors or selling groups in overseas markets where separate share issues were being made; and United States and Canadian nationals were specifically prohibited from applying for shares in the United Kingdom offer for sale under the terms of the United Kingdom prospectus.

Fibre Optics and Optoelectronics Schemes

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will make a statement describing the expenditure so far incurred on and the results achieved from the fibre optics scheme and the joint optoelectronics research scheme;

(2) whether he is satisfied that the fibre optics scheme and the joint optoelectronics research scheme are creating an adequate supply infrastructure within British industry;

(3) whether he is satisfied that the firms involved in the fibre optics scheme and joint optoelectronics research scheme have succeeded in creating a set of targeted markets;

(4) whether he is satisfied that the lessons learnt from the failure of British industry to exploit liquid crystal technology have been successfully applied by those involved in the fibre optics scheme and joint optoelectronics research scheme.

Mr. Butcher: Under the fibre optics and optoelectronics scheme £44 million has been committed to 128 projects in 40 companies involving research and development and production investment of £188 million. Most of the projects have yet to be completed, but major successes can already be identified, such as:

the establishment of advanced production capacity for optical fibre and cable to meet the needs of the home telecommunications market and export markets;

the creation of a United Kingdom capability in fibre optic-based under-sea communications;

the establishment of Europe's foremost capability in semiconductor lasers;

the building up of a wide variety of infrastructure activities —special optical fibres, process equipment, instrumentation, lasers, detectors, connectors, and other components; support for the development of several successful optoelectronic products, eg liquid crystal displays for airports, infra-red imagers for emergency services, intruder alarms; assistance to a variety of small companies (including four start-ups) many of which have become well established on world markets; encouragement of several large groups to diversify into optoelectronics.

In the area of display technology, the United Kingdom is a major world supplier of base material. Under FOS, several projects for the development of displays are being supported, most of which lead to commercially successful products, for example, airport displays, large TV displays for outdoor public events. However, I am disappointed that United Kingdom industry has generally not been more successful in world markets. A further initiative on basic research in solid state displays under the joint optoelectronics research scheme, in conjunction with the Alvey programme, has recently been launched and proposals are currently being considered.

Under JOERS £25 million has been made available for pre-competitive, collaborative research. There has been a rapid take up of funds and £9·5 million of DTI's allocation of £10 million has been committed, with industry matching this sum; the Science and Engineering research council has already had to extend its allocation of £5 million to allow a commitment of £5·3 million. Twenty-one projects are being supported involving 15 companies and 26 universities.

Most projects have been running for over a year, but it is too early to assess the results. However, it is clear that considerable momentum has been generated and the very high quality of the proposals indicates that the United Kingdom's research capability in optoelectronics has been substantially strengthened.

As far as the market orientation of the scheme is concerned, under FOS only those projects with a definite market focus and promise of exploitation are considered for support. On the other hand, JOERS involves basic research of a type which it is generally too early to identify the precise products and markets in which the results will be exploited. However, as far as possible, support is tied to evidence of the intention to exploit and the prospects for exploitation have been maximised by giving companies the ownership of the resulting intellectual property.

Bureaux de Change

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce measures to regulate trading practices in bureaux de change.

Mr. Butcher: The Government hope to make an announcement to the House on this matter shortly.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total number and value of offers of regional assistance made to companies in west Cumbria travel-to-work areas, in Cumbria as a whole, in the north-west region and in the northern region for the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Trippier: In November 1984, 20 offers of assistance totalling £1·44 million were made under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 towards projects in the north-west region. Of these one offer totalling £45,000 was made in the west Cumbria travel-to-work area but not other offers were made to companies in Cumbria. 13 offers totalling £2·40 million were made towards projects in the north-east region.

Footcuffs (Exports)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many footcuffs have been exported to Kenya in the last year; and if any orders for such goods for future delivery are known to his Department.

Mr. Butcher: Since the imposition of export licensing control in February 1984 no licences for the export of leg irons (footcuffs) have been issued for Kenya or any other destination. I know of no orders for future delivery of such goods.

Small Firms

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many small firms, by Bolton committee definition, presently exist in each region of the United Kingdom;

(2) how many small firms, by Bolton committee definition, went out of business in each region of the United Kingdom during the course of the last 12 months;

(3) how many small firms, by Bolton committee definition, were set up in each region of the United Kingdom during the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Trippier: The information available by region for the years 1980 to 1983 was published in British Business,

2 November 1984, page 352. Later estimates by counties within regions for the same years were published in British Business on 18 January 1985. Copies of the articles were placed in the Library. Estimates for 1984 are not yet available.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the full list of Government schemes which exist to assist small firms; when each scheme was started; and when it is due to finish.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 22 January at col 367. Only a small number of schemes are launched with a specific closing date. One such scheme was the small engineering firms investment scheme introduced by this Department on 30 March 1982. Demand was so great that the closing date for the scheme had to be brought forward to 28 May 1982. A second such scheme was introduced on 28 March 1983 and closed on 30 September 1983. The loan guarantee scheme for small firms was introduced on a pilot basis on 1 June 1981 for three years. It was initially extended for a further period until 31 December 1984, and has subsequently been extended for a further year until 31 December 1985. On 26 November 1984 my Department launched a £100 million programme of support from the European regional development fund and the United Kingdom Government to provide aids for small firms in United Kingdom areas affected by the decline of the steel, shipbuilding and textile industries. Depending upon take up of funds, applications will be accepted up to 31 December 1988.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small firms, by Bolton committee definition, he has assisted by regional development grant, selective financial assistance or any other financial assistance in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved in each region of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons accused of scheduled offences on the basis of accomplice witnesses' testimony are currently awaiting trial in Northern Ireland; how many persons have been convicted; how many persons have been acquitted of such crimes after having been charged either wholly or partially on the basis of accomplice witnesses' testimony; and how many persons have been released following the retraction of testimony by accomplice witnesses in each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: On 28 January 1985, 112 persons were on remand or had been returned for trial for scheduled offences in cases in which it was intended that an alleged accomplice would give evidence for the Crown.

The other information is not available in the form requested, but during the period from 1 January 1980 to 28 January 1985, 143 people were convicted in trials where accomplice evidence was tendered, 78 people were acquitted in such trials, and 123 people were released following the retraction of accomplice evidence.

Application Forms (Education Details)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce application forms for all vacancies in the Civil Service and public authority advertised vacancies which will not require information on schools attended at primary and post primary level; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: No. As has already been announced, candidates for posts in the Northern Ireland Civil Service are to be invited to record details of their primary education. There will be accompanying advice that answers will be treated as strictly confidential, that the information will be used only for the Civil Service Commission's monitoring of recruitment and that the absence of a response will not be taken into consideration in the selection of candidates for appointment.

Full details of second and third level education will continue to be required where reference to the institutions concerned is a feature of the recruitment process.

Recruitment to posts in public authorities is a matter for those authorities themselves.

Ministers (Overnight Stays)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many overnight stays he and each of his Ministers spent in the Province during the month of January.

Mr. Hurd: The information is as follows:

	Number
Secretary of State	12
Dr. Rhodes Boyson	12
Mr. Nicholas Scott	4
Mr. Christopher Patten	5
Lord Lyell	8

Prescriptions

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the increase in the number of prescriptions issued for all drugs in Northern Ireland in the last 10 years; how much of that increase is attributable to prescriptions for tonics, cough remedies, antacids, laxatives, minor analgesics and vitamins; and what saving is expected to accrue from controlling the issue of prescriptions for such drugs, as outlined in the Government's proposals.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Prescriptions issued by General Practitioners (Prescribing Doctors)

	1976	1983	Change
All Drugs	11,496	13,152	+1,656
Tonics	57	50	−7
Cough Remedies	879	860	−19
Antacids	293	296	+3
Laxatives	181	254	+73
Minor Analgesics	709	843	+134
Thousands vitamins	280	342	+62

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prescriptions for benzodiazepine tranquillisers and sedatives were issued in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years by (a) general practitioners, (b) hospital doctors, (c) appliance contractors and (d) dispensing doctors in the National Health Service; if he will publish this information in the Official Report tabulated for each health board area; and what is their aggregate net ingredient cost and their total cost, including discount on costs and payments to pharmacists.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is available only in respect of those prescriptions issued by general practitioners for sedatives and tranquillisers and this is as follows, together with details of the net ingredient costs of this group of drugs:

Year	Number of prescriptions (000)	Net ingredient cost (£000)
1979	793	799
1980	749	863
1981	758	1,002
1982	749	1,099
1983	697	1,079

It is estimated that the net ingredient cost comprises approximately 77 per cent. of the total cost.

The information on a health and social services board basis is not readily available.

Limited List Prescribing

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with organisations, individuals and members of the nursing and medical profession in Northern Ireland to ascertain their views on the Government's proposed regulations on the range of prescribable drugs under the National Health Service.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have discussed the proposals with the Pharmaceutical Society of Northern Ireland and Galen Limited, of Craigavon, the only two interests who requested a meeting.

Security

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take the necessary steps to sustain the full fabric of its society for the Protestant community in areas close to the frontier with the Irish Republic where the Irish Republican Army's campaign to murder Protestants has disadvantaged it.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 70]: The Government's security, economic and social policies are intended to maintain, and where possible improve the quality of life for the whole community in Northern Ireland. If the hon. Gentleman has any particular suggestions, I hope he will let me know.

Farmers

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has recently considered how farmers, who were living close to the frontier with the Irish Republic and were forced by Irish Republican Army activity to abandon their holdings in the mid-1970s, can now be compensated for loss of earnings in the same way as other businesses were at that time.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 70]: No. Compensation for loss of earnings is payable only to employees.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to assist farmers, who were displaced by Irish Republican Army activity from their holdings close to the frontier with the Irish Republic, to return to their properties; and whether he believes their safety can now reasonably be assured.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 70]: Displaced farmers wishing to reinstate their holdings would be eligible for specialist advice from the Department of Agriculture and priority could be given to applications for farm grants and subsidies. The security forces try to assist everyone at risk; if any farmer has a particular concern about his personal safety the Royal Ulster Constabulary would be glad to advise him.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Employment Schemes

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many people are now employed in schemes funded directly or indirectly by his Department; and what is the cost of these schemes;

(2) how many people are now receiving training in schemes funded directly or indirectly by his Department; and what is the cost of these schemes;

(3) if he will list the names of the schemes administered or funded by his Department which provide training; and what is the average cost per head for each person trained;

(4) if he will list the names of the schemes administered or funded by his Department which provide employment; and what is the average cost per head for each person employed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: It is estimated that about 360,000 people were provided with employment and over 330,000 were receiving training on schemes administered by my Department and the Manpower Services Commission at the end of December 1984.

The estimate provision for employment schemes for 1984-85 is £1,045 million and for training schemes it is £1,065 million (excluding administration costs).

The approximate gross costs per filled place or per person supported on the main schemes administered or funded by my Department or the Manpower Services Commission which provide employment or training are:

Full-Time Job Release	3,250
Part-Time Job Release	1,590
Young Workers Scheme	560
Job Splitting Scheme	750
Community Programme	4,290
Community Industry	2,370
Enterprise Allowance Scheme	1,964
Youth Training Scheme	1,850
Training Opportunities Scheme	2,500

Notes:

1. These figures are averages associated with present levels of coverage and present assumptions; the marginal cost of expanding any particular scheme could be substantially different.
2. The figures take no account of the wider impact of the measures on the labour market or the economy more generally.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Manpower Services Commission intends to offer contracts for periods greater than one year to managing agents of youth training schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission is currently considering the possibility of offering contracts for longer than one year to some managing agents. I shall write to the hon. Member when a decision is reached.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training scheme places were identified and supported in the Workington travel-to-work area and the county of Cumbria during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of January 1985 there were 1,353 approved places in the Allerdale and Copeland local authority districts, which largely correspond to the Workington travel-to-work area, and 3,595 approved places in the county of Cumbria.

None of these places were approved during the month of January, as sufficient youth training scheme places to cater for the needs of eligible youngsters in the county of Cumbria for 1984-85 had already been identified and approved before the end of 1984.

Motor Vehicle Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the reduction in real earnings per hour in the motor vehicle industry relative to the economy generally between 1970 and 1979 and between 1979 and the latest date for which figures are available; and what has been the corresponding change in employment in the industry absolutely and as a percentage of the numbers at the beginning of each period.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table sets out the available information on relative average hourly earnings and employment in the motor vehicle industry in Great Britain in 1970, 1979 and 1981.

	1970	1979	1984
Average gross hourly earnings of full-time adult male manual employees in the motor vehicle industry as a percentage of those in all industries and services*	130·5	112·5	110·8
Employees in employment in the motor vehicle industry†
Number (thousands)	506	461	294
As percentages of:
1970	100	91

* Based on New Earnings Survey results in respect of a pay period each April. For 1970 and 1979 the figures relate to those aged 21 and over and for 1984 to those on adult rates.

† All employees in respect of June each year. There are minor differences in coverage (less than ½ per cent.) because of changes in the industrial classification between 1979 and 1984.

Benefit Offices

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what reviews have been undertaken by his Department on the separation of employment offices from benefit offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There has been no specific overall review of this arrangement since a decision to make the change in the early 1970s. However, my Department keeps under constant review the effective operation of unemployment benefit offices, as does the Manpower Services Commission in the case of jobcentres and employment offices. The two networks are now managed and organised separately, although some offices remain co-located and the advantages and disadvantages of location in the same building, or close by, are taken into account when any change of premises is considered.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the net change in jobs in Lancashire for the period 1979 to the latest date for which figures are available in the following industries: (a) mining, (b) chemicals, (c) metal manufacture, (d) footwear, (e) mechanical engineering, (f) textiles and (g) paper and printing.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information on employment in local areas is from the June 1978 and the following September 1981 census of employment. Net changes in the number of employees in employment in the industries quoted in Lancashire in that period are as follows:

Standard Industrial Classification (1968)	Thousands
Order II Mining and Quarrying	−0·6
Order V Chemicals and Allied Industries	−2·6
Order VI Metal Manufacture	+0·4
MLH 450 Footwear	−0·8
Order VII Mechanical Engineering	+1·7
Order XIII Textiles	−16·0
Order XVIII Paper, Printing and Publishing	−1·0

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons, both male and female, were placed in employment by the Workington jobcentre in the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Workington jobcentre placed 69 people in the five-week period ending 4 January 1985, the latest for which statistics are available. Separate figures for males and females are not compiled monthly.

There is likely to have been a substantial number of people who found jobs in the area other than through the jobcentre. Nationally it is estimated that about a quarter of all engagements are made through jobcentres.

Temporary Short-time Working Compensation Scheme

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs in the Workington travel-to-work area were being supported by the temporary short-time working scheme during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: There was no potentially redundant jobs for which reimbursement was claimed under the temporary short-time working compensation scheme in December 1984 in the Workington travel-to-work area.

The scheme closed for applications on 31 March 1984.

Community Programme

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many community programme places were being supported in the Workington travel-to-work area and the county of Cumbria during the last month for which statistics are available; and how many of those places were part-time and full-time places, respectively.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 14 December 1984, 578 community programme places were being supported on the Workington travel-to-work area, and 1,211 in Cumbria. Of those in Workington 402 were part-time and 176 full-time, and of those in Cumbria 839 and 372 respectively.

Youth Training Scheme and Community Programme

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many additional places were sponsored by Allerdale district council under the youth training scheme, and the community programme separately for the last month for which statistics are available; and what is the total number of places now being supported by that authority under each scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No youth training scheme places are currently being sponsored by Allerdale district council

The council has a community programme agency for 395 places. Projects with 381 places have been approved and 362 were filled on 14 December 1984.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, by region, the start-up figures under the enterprise allowance scheme at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: At 31 December 1984 the number of people by region who had entered the enterprise allowance scheme since it was introduced nationally on 1 August 1983 was as follows:

	Number
London	5,864
Southern	9,599
South West	5,008
Midlands	10,952
North West	12,075
Yorkshire and Humberside	5,755
Scotland	4,999
Wales	3,984
Northern	3,455
Total	61,691

Accidents at Work

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest available figures reported under the Health and Safety at Work Act on the number of accidents at work involving children under the age of 16 years in paid part-time employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Records available to the Health and Safety Executive of injuries reported to enforcing authorities under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act for 1982 (the latest year for which figures are readily available) show 629 injuries to children under 16 reported to be in employment.

Over half of this total refers to children at school. About one-fifth of the total is estimated to involve children actually in employment: the rest arise from misreporting of injuries to non-employed children. Returns from local authorities are incomplete.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Premises (Propaganda)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Prime Minister if the administrative rules requiring civil servants not to use Government offices for party political or commercial purposes apply to the premises of other statutory bodies financed by the Exchequer; and whether it is the practice of nationalised industries, water authorities and the National Health Service to advise their employees and contractors not to use such public premises for the display of political propaganda.

The Prime Minister: The rules governing the conduct of civil servants do not apply to non-civil servants employed by public bodies, though the bodies may choose to adopt these or similar rules if they consider them appropriate to their particular circumstances. Information is not held centrally on the current management practice of the various nationalised industries, water authorities and NHS authorities.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister whether the Civil Service Commission has reported on the terms and conditions of the new Head of Defence Procurement, Mr. Peter Levene.

The Prime Minister: It has been decided that Mr. Levene will join the Ministry of Defence on secondment. The precise terms are still under consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Salmon Netting (Solway Firth)

Mr. Soames asked the Prime Minister which of her Ministers exercises responsibility in respect of the control of the netting of salmon in the Solway Firth.

The Prime Minister: Responsibility for control of the netting of salmon in the Solway Firth rests with the north west authority in English waters and the various district salmon fishery boards in Scottish waters. Within the Government, responsibility for these matters rests with my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Scotland respectively.

ENERGY

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the submissions that he received from English cities bidding for lead city status in the development of the combined heat and power programme.

Mr. David Hunt: There is no intention to publish the submissions received from the consortia which sought Government financial assistance towards the cost of preparing prospectuses for combined heat and power development.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of the housing stock is heated by combined heat and power schemes in Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Italy, West Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 1 February to the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) at column 341.

Coal (Domestic Consumption)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many tonnes of coal were burned by domestic households in 1964, 1974 and at the nearest available date in 1984.

Mr. David Hunt: Information on total deliveries of coal for domestic consumption is published annually in the "Digest of UK Energy Statistics", and monthly in Energy Trends, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Sleipner Gas Project

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to meet the chairman of British Gas; and if at the meeting he proposes to discuss the Sleipner gas project.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I discussed Sleipner with the chairman of the British Gas Corporation on a number of occasions before the Government reached a conclusion on the project.

WALES

Disabled Persons (Housing Amenities)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that the provision of basic housing amenities required by disabled people are subject to mandatory grants from local authorities.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Mandatory grants are already available for the provision of missing basic amenities in a dwelling and for the provision of additional standard amenities where existing amentities are not readily accessible to a disabled occupant because of his or her disability.

Psychiatric Treatment (Consents)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines his Department has issued to psychiatric hospitals and sub-normality hospitals in Wales concerning the giving of medication or medical treatment in cirumstances where the patient is not in a condition to give meaningful consent for his treatment.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our Department issued WHN(83)31 in December 1983 which provided guidance to health authorities on the phasing in of the consent to treatment provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983. Paragraph 6 of the circular refers specially to those patients who are not able or capable of giving informed consent to treatment. The explanatory memorandum to the Mental Health Act 1983 also provides guidance for all those working with the Act; paragraphs 189 to 204 are relevant. Copies of WHN(83)31 and the explanatory memorandum are available from the Library of the House.

Tourism

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are his projections of the sums to be made available to the Welsh tourist board to enable the board to undertake an overseas promotion programme.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Wales tourist board does not itself have resources for tourism promotion programmes overseas. Overseas promotion on behalf of Wales is within the responsibility of the British Tourist Authority and is not separately identified within its expenditure. I announced on 17 November 1983 at column 529-30 further development of the arrangements for Welsh involvement in the authority's marketing programme.

Housing Starts

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of housing starts in 1984 and 1983 in (a) the private and (b) the public sector.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is:

	Number of dwelling starts
	Private Sector	Public Sector
1983	6,244	2,265
*1984	5,200	1,200

* Provisional estimates.

Welsh Water Authority (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what additional financial assistance he will give to the Welsh water authority to compensate for the effects of the drought in 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are no additional financial resouces immediately available to meet the costs of the drought in 1984. The Welsh water authority is responsible for establishing priorities within the overall total of moneys available to meet capital and revenue expenditure, including expenditure during exceptional events such as last year's drought. These moneys are found from charges made to the consumers and through external borrowing on which a limit is set up by the Government.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if there are any changes to his Department's cash limits in the current year in connection with expenditure on transport and industry.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes. The cash limit on class XVI, Vote 1 is being reduced by £10,573,000 from £744,062,000 to £733,489,000. This reduction reflects the fact that spending on the trunk road programme has fallen below provision, mainly on account of protracted netgotiations on land acquisition and a lower rate of spend on schemes under construction than forecast.

Also, the cash limit on class XVI, 5 is being reduced by £1,270,000 from £47,757,000 to £46,487,000. This reduction relates to the provision of the Welsh Development Agency and reflects the agency's success in attracting higher than estimated income, which will allow it to carry out its programmes at a lower net cost to the Government.

Subject to parliamentary approval, these savings will be used largely to offset increases in class XVI, vote 2 and class XVI, vote 8.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Research Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many full-time equivalent research scientists and engineers are employed in higher education in the United Kingdom, West Germany and Japan.

Mr. Brooke: Data are not available to permit this comparison to be made. However in 1983-84 10,720 academic staff were employed full-time on research in United Kingdom universities only. This excludes substantial numbers of staff spending part of their time on research in universities and staff in polytechnics and other institutions of higher education.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to extend the technical and vocational education initiative.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have been asked to reply because the technical and vocational education initiative is administered by the Manpower Services Commission.

Under the extension plans we announced last November all those local education authorities (education authorities in Scotland) not currently participating in the initiative were invited to submit a proposal with a view to starting a project this year or next.

School Meals

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the estimated total of teachers, meal supervisors and school staff who take school luncheon; and how many of them pay.

Mr. Dunn: The number of meals provided to adults at maintained schools in England on a day in October 1983, the latest date for which information is available, was:

	On payment	Free
Teachers	11,853	189,947
Midday Supervisory Assistants	1,961	73,238
Kitchen and Canteen Staff	6,652	114,823
Others	3,316	18,003

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the estimated cost of providing one school lunch and as to how much of this is the actual value of the food.

Mr. Dunn: Local authorities' estimates for 1984-85 show that expenditure on food, net of EEC subsidies, represents 26 per cent. of the total gross cost of providing meals. The Department does not have the information from which to calculate the average cost of a meal.

School Building

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the percentage of capital expenditure on major school building projects started in each of the last 10 years represented by projects at voluntary aided schools; and what is the corresponding percentage in the starts programme approved for the year 1985-86.

Mr. Dunn: The information is not available in the form requested. The percentages of the value of major projects approved by the Department represented by work at voluntary aided and special agreement schools for the years 1975-76 to 1983-84 were:

	Per cent.
1975-76	16
1976-77	13
1977-78	12
1978-79	15
1979-80	14
1980-81	14
1981-82	12
1982-83	16
1983-84	12

Corresponding figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are not yet available; and, since allocations to LEAs are unhypothecated and are no longer made on the basis of starts, estimates cannot be made. However, the percentages of allocations for all school capital expenditure in those years represented by the allocation for voluntary aided and special agreement schools were:

	Per cent.
1984-85	12
1985-86	15

Building Grants

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of grants for 1985-86 for school building and modernisation.

Sir Keith Joseph: The annual allocations of prescribed capital expenditure made to local education authorities are not grants but indications of basic permitted spending levels. Grant is paid only in respect of projects at voluntary aided and special agreement schools. On the implications of the 1985-86 allocations, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) on 10 January 1985 at column 526.

Primary School (Reception Classes)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children commenced primary school education reception classes in 1985 under the age of four years and nine months; how this figure compares with that in each year since 1979; and if he is satisfied that proper nursery education provision is made for them.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect information on pupils commencing school. Annual returns are made on the number of children in infant classes in maintained primary schools in England on the census day in January. The published figures for under-fives exclude children whose fifth birthday fell between the previous September and December, ie those over four years eight months on 31 August. The annual totals from 1979 onwards are:

	Annual total
1979	218,392
1980	213,469
1981	206,507
1982	201,279
1983	210,372
1984	236,417

It is for the LEAs to make the appropriate provision for these pupils, but there is evidence, for example from what is seen and reported on by HMI, that such provision is not always fully appropriate. In my reply to the hon. Member on 1 February at column 330 I indicated steps which are being taken to disseminate good practice.

Universities and Polytechnics (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the staff-student ratio in each university and polytechnic in the west midlands county for the academic year 1984-85; and how this ratio compares with that in each academic year since 1978-79.

Mr. Brooke: The latest available information is:

Student/staff ratios

	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
University
Aston	10·5	10·2	10·0	10·5	11·0	11·9
Birmingham	8·6	8·4	8·3	8·5	8·7	9·1
Warwick	10·5	10·2	10·6	11·5	11·2	11·4
Polytechnic (advanced level work only)
Birmingham	9·7	9·2	9·4	8·8	7·8	10·5
Lanchester	9·0	9·6	9·7	10·0	10·7	10·9
Wolverhampton	8·0	9·0	9·7	9·9	10·6	11·5

University student-staff ratios are calculated as the full-time equivalent student load divided by the number of full-time departmental academic staff paid wholly from university funds. Polytechnics student-staff ratios are calculated as full-time equivalent student load divided by the full-time equivalent number of lecturers who are involved in teaching. The university ratios are therefore not directly comparable with those for the public sector, although the polytechnic figures are restricted to advanced level work only.

Unemployed Adults

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the 13 local education authorities on which the study published by his Department entitled "Education for Unemployed Adults: Problems and Good Practice" was based; and how many adults registered as unemployed benefit claimants have enrolled on courses of further or higher education or on adult training education courses since 1981.

Mr. Brooke: Mrs. Joan McDonald's study was carried out on the basis of getting together information which would help the Department's preparations for the REPLAN initiative aimed at improving educational opportunities for the adult unemployed. The local education authorities concerned co-operated freely without any expectation that they would be identified and I do not think that it would be appropriate to name them at this stage. The statistical information requested is not collected by the Department.

Teacher Training

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied that teacher training courses currently being run contain sufficient instruction methods on pupil discipline and control; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Most teacher training courses include a course module or unit on classroom management and control. However, this is an area in which there is no substitute for practical experience in the classroom. New criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses issued last year by my right hon. Friend, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, require that in future all courses should include a substantial element of school experience and teaching practice and that this should offer experience of class management and control. The criteria also make it clear that in no case should a qualification carrying qualified teacher status be awarded to a student whose practical classroom work is unsatisfactory.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug Offences (Lancashire)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions took place in Lancashire in 1983 against persons alleged to have committed drug offences; and in how many cases such prosecutions were successful.

Mr. Mellor: Three hundred and sixty-four persons were proceeded against in the Lancashire police force area in 1983 for offences under drugs legislation or for other offences involving controlled drugs, 354 of whom were found guilty.

GLC Police Exhibition

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contribution was made by the Metropolitan police or his Department to the Greater London council's police exhibition currently touring London boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Neither the Metropolitan police nor the Home Office made any contribution to this exhibition.

Parking Offences (Diplomats)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the number of parking tickets evaded by diplomats in the Metropolitan police area in each of the last three years for which figures are available; if he will break the figures down by country in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The following table, compiled from figures made available by the Metropolitan Police, gives details of the total number of fixed penalty notices cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity for the three year period 1981-83 (which is the latest period for which complete figures are available) broken down by country and organisation.

These figures are a matter for real concern. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will be covering this subject in his response to the report by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on the abuse of diplomatic immunities and priveleges.

Fixed penalty notices cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity (Metropolitan Police district)

Stateless Persons

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why he does not collect information on the number of stateless people in the United Kingdom; if he will now do so; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether there is any measure available to Her Majesty's Government which would enable him to estimate the number of stateless persons residing in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We do not consider that the demand for information on the number of stateless persons resident in the United Kingdom would justify the costs involved in obtaining it.

There is no source of information collected for another purpose from which an estimate could be made with an acceptable degree of accuracy.

HM Prison, Styal

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests he has received since 1 January 1984 from the governor of Her Majesty's prison, Styal, for an increase in staff; and what was his response to those requests.

Mr. Mellor: The only formal bid received in the period concerned requested approval to recruit a prison auxiliary to escort outside contractors engaged to improve the gymnasium facilities at Styal. The bid is under consideration. The governor has also suggested, as one of several possible courses of action, an increase in night staffing levels. This possibility is being examined.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes have taken place in night staffing and supervision at Her Majesty's prison, Styal, since 1 November 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Night-time staffing levels at Styal have varied from 10 to 13 staff on duty on any one night. Since November 1984 the minimum number of staff on duty on any one night has been raised from 10 to 11.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what reports his Department has received of night violence and sexual assaults against youth custody prisoners at Her Majesty's prison, Styal; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will appoint a judicial inquiry into the organisation, staffing, and facilities at Her Majesty's prison, Styal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On the 23 November 1984 immediately before the action described in the reply given to a Question from the hon. Member on 1 February at column 332, the governor of Styal prison and youth custody centre reported his concern about bullying and mentioned that there had been 20 incidents of that kind during the previous 12 months. Three of these (in June, July and October) had been sufficiently serious to warrant being reported to the prison department north regional office at the time. A further incident was reported at the end of November, and another in January 1985. In some of these cases a sexual element was suspected though not substantiated.

The situation at Styal is being very closely watched and we are advised that there has been a marked improvement. My right hon. and learned Friend does not propose to set up a judicial inquiry.

Detention Centres

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the new regime for detention centres will come into operation.

Mr. Brittan: On 6 March 1985. The new regime will follow the lines I outlined in reply to a question from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) on 24 July 1984 at columns 578-80. Copies of a note summarising its main features have been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

CIVIL SERVICE

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether, as a result of the ethnic surveys undertaken in the north-west and county of Avon, respectively, he has asked the key questions specified in the code of the Commission for Racial Equality; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government will be taking the key questions into account in considering the data arising from the north-west and Avon and subsequent surveys.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether he will now take positive action, as recommended in the code of the Commission for Racial Equality, in order to remedy any discrimination revealed by the ethnic surveys undertaken in the north-west and the county of Avon, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information obtained in the survey of staff in the north-west and county of Avon will need to be considered in relation to that obtained from the surveys of job applicants in these areas, which should be available in the spring.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether as a result of the ethnic surveys undertaken in the north-west and the county of Avon, he is planning any change in methods of recruitment, promotion or training, respectively, or otherwise, so as to counter any possible discrimination.

Mr. Hayhoe: We shall be considering what further steps are necessary in the light of the report on recruitment surveys in the north-west and Avon, to be published in the spring. We have already strengthened the central guidance on recruitment and promotion following the report on the review of personnel policies and procedures as they affect race relations in the Civil Service published in December 1983 in an endeavour to counter possible discrimination. Similar steps are in hand to update guidance on training.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he expects to begin the ethnic surveys to cover all non-industrial staff in the east and west midlands.

Mr. Hayhoe: The surveys are expected to begin this summer in the east and west midlands.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he expects to institute a programme of ethnic monitoring to cover industrial staff in the east and west midlands.

Mr. Hayhoe: An appropriate timetable is still being worked out.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service what necessary arrangements he is making in order to introduce ethnic monitoring to all new entrants to the Civil Service; when he expects such arrangements to commence and to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Discussions between departmental officials are taking place to set up procedures for obtaining the ethnic information from new entrants from the autumn.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service what separate arrangements are being worked out for the ethnic monitoring of industrial staff; and by whom.

Mr. Hayhoe: The working environment and management systems for industrials are different from those for non-industrials. An appropriate method and timetable for the surveys is being worked out by officials from the Cabinet Office, in consultation with employing departments and the trade union side of the Joint Co-ordinating Committee for Government Industrials.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service by whom consideration will be given to further monitoring of recruitment schemes in the light of the results of the recruitment surveys undertaken in the north-west and county of Avon, respectively, and when; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Further monitoring of recruitment schemes will be considered by officials of the Cabinet Office and Her Majesty's Treasury in the light of the results of the recruitment surveys undertaken in the north-west and the county of Avon. A statement will be made when the report on these surveys is published in the spring.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service by whom the recruitment surveys undertaken in the north-west and the county of Avon are being analysed.

Mr. Hayhoe: The surveys are being analysed centrally by officials of the Cabinet Office and Her Majesty's Treasury.

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service who is preparing the report on the data from the recruitment surveys undertaken in the north-west and county of Avon, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: The report on the data is being prepared by officials of the Cabinet Office and Her Majesty's Treasury.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Tests (Radiation)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the National Radiological Protection Board's plans for a morbidity study of United Kingdom participants in the British nuclear tests in Australia and the South Pacific in the 1950s; what methods of analysis will be used; and what are the objectives.

Mr. Butler: This is a matter for the National Radiological Protection Board to answer. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the protocol for the study, which has been previously supplied to him.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in his new post as Head of Defence Procurement, Mr. Peter Levene will receive help with pension contributions.

Mr. Butler: The full terms of Mr. Levene's secondment to the Ministry of Defence have yet to be settled.

Rapier Air Defence System

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost of manning the Rapier air defence system which is part of the Trident offset arrangement.

Mr. Butler: The estimated cost of pay and allowances for 1985-86 is £4·5 million at current prices.

US Facilities, Kings Bay

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is Her Majesty's Government's contribution towards the cost of the United States facilities at Kings Bay.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom contribution to the capital cost of the jointly used facilities at Kings Bay, has been agreed at $70 million in fiscal year 1983 dollars. Provision for this payment is included within the current Trident estimate of £9,285 million and is also taken into account in the Department's assessment of the savings of over £700 million at 1984-85 prices arising from the Kings Bay missile processing agreement.

Trident

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what inflation rates were assumed (a) for the United Kingdom and (b) for the United States of America in the Trident cost estimates published in (i) March 1982, (ii) March 1984 and (iii) January 1985.

Mr. Butler: The estimates to which the hon. Member refers were all expressed at constant prices and made no assumptions regarding future inflation. Between the March 1982 estimate of 7,500 million (at September 1981 prices) and the current estimate of £9,285 million (at average prices for the 1984-85 financial year) price levels in the United States and United Kingdom on Trident have increased on average by 18·8 per cent. and 17·2 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the maximum number of warheads which each Trident D5 missile will be designed to carry.

Mr. Stanley: The design payload of the Trident D5 missile system is classified, although it was stated in defence open government document 82/1 that the missile was expected to be able to carry up to 14 warheads, which is the limit for SLBMs under the terms of the SALT II treaty. We have made it clear that the United Kingdom move to Trident D5 will not involve any significant change in the planned total number of warheads associated with our strategic deterrent force in comparison with the original intentions for a force deploying the Trident C4 missile system.

Wintex 85

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the areas of the north-west region that he expects to be used by ground forces during the Wintex 85 exercises; and what are the flight paths to be used by aircraft affecting the north-west.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on 11 February 1985 at column 51.

Argentina (Military Equipment)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has regarding maintenance clauses in contracts involving British companies and the supply of military equipment and spare parts to Argentina; and if all such maintenance clauses were agreed upon before the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 186]: Maintenance clauses in such contracts are not subject to approval by Her Majesty's Government, and a number of companies will have legal obligations for maintenance for equipment sold to Argentina before the Falklands Conflict. As far as I am aware no contracts have been signed since.

There has been an embargo on the supply of defence and defence related equipment direct to Argentina since the beginning of 1982. Although this embargo does not extend to certain spare parts, there is no record of any trade in these with Argentina.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Maude asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement setting out the intention and purpose of value added tax control visits made by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers.

Mr. Hayhoe: The purpose of VAT control visits, which are made by appointment, is to make selective checks on the records and accounts of businesses and so to ensure that they are calculating and paying the correct amount of VAT on all of their taxable activities. For newly registered traders the visit also provides an early opportunity to resolve any practical problems which arise in the first year. During 1983-84 about 350,000 control visits were made to registered traders. Under-declarations of tax discovered as a result of these visits amounted to about £320 million. Over-declarations of tax of about £6 million were also found.

Following a recommendation made in the report of the committee on the enforcement powers of the Revenue Departments, Customs and Excise has now issued a new booklet entitled "Visits by VAT Officers" which explains in simple terms why they are made and what happens during the visit.

Oil Prices

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates his Department has made of the consequences for the pound sterling and for national revenue of a $5 per barrel decrease in the price of oil.

Mr. Moore: No estimates of the effects of a $5 fall in the price of oil have been made. But the Department does of course keep under review the prospects for tax revenues in the light of current and prospective economic developments, including those in the oil market.

Personal Taxation (Statistics)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) personal taxation, including social security contributions and (b) all direct and indirect taxation as a percentage of income for each of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development member states for the most recent convenient year.

Mr. Moore: The information is available only for the following OECD countries and the latest available figures relate to 1982:

Percentage of total personal income, 1982

	*Personal taxation and social security contributions	Total direct taxes†	Total indirect taxes
Australia	16·1	19·7	15·6

Sources: Derived from OECD National Accounts Volume II Detailed tables 1970-82 and Revenue Statistics of OECD Member countries 1965-1983.

It should be noted that total direct and indirect taxes relate to total Government receipts and not only to payments by persons.

Wage and Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the natural effect on the exchange rate of his simulation on the relationship between real wages and employment; whether the assumed relationship between the exchange rate and prices was the same as that set out in Treasury working paper No. 2; and whether he will publish in the Official Report the relevant data together with the unemployment figures for manufacturing and for the whole economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: The effect on the effective exchange rate in simulations of lower real wages under various assumptions about fiscal and monetary policy is shown in tables A to D of annex B of the recent paper by Treasury officials entitled "The Relationship between Employment and Wages". The effects on employment in the whole economy are also contained in these tables; the relevant figures for employment in manufacturing, consistent with table A, are:

	Percentage change from base
Year 1	0·2

The relationship between the exchange rate and prices assumed on the Treasury model has altered since the publication of Treasury working paper No. 2. Changes to the model have been set out in successive issues of the technical manual. The most recent results of simulations of the effect of an exchange rate change were published in "HM Treasury Macroeconomic Model Technical Manual supplement 1984" (J. Barber ed.)

Motor Vehicles (Taxation)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total receipts received from the taxation of each class of motor vehicle in the last financial year for which statistics are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: The latest year for which statistics of revenue receipts are available is 1983-84. For vehicle excise duty the receipts by category of vehicles were:

Category	Revenue (£ million)
Cars and light vans	1,578
Heavy goods vehicles	383
Motor cycles	22
Taxis, buses and coaches	7
Haulage vehicles and agricultural machines	7

Other forms of indirect taxation are not collected by category of vehicle, so the information is not available in the form requested. Revenue from the other forms of taxation bearing on vehicles is as follows:

Tax	Revenue (£ million)
Petrol duty	4,340
Derv duty	1,074
VAT on vehicle sales	*1,450
VAT on road fuel	*875
Car tax	703

* Estimate of non-recoverable VAT.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the current price cost in 1983-84 of administering income tax.

Mr. Moore: The estimated cost of administering income tax in 1983-84 was £680 million in 1983-84 prices.

THE ARTS

Office of Arts and Libraries

Mr. Proctor asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what has been the total cost of the administration of the Office of Arts and Libraries expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science gave him on 11 February at column 5.

Nostell Priory (Furniture)

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what consultations

Her Majesty's Government are having to ensure the retention in the United Kingdom of the collection of Chippendale furniture at Nostell Priory made specifically for that house.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend met Lord St. Oswald recently to discuss this matter. No formal offer has yet been received regarding the Chippendal collection.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Community (Aims and Objectives)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the principal aims and objectives of the European Economic Community in the coming year.

Mr. Luce: There is no single statement of Community priorities, though we have proposed to other member states that there should be such a statement in future. However, the priorities of the Italian Presidency were set out in the Italian Foreign Minister's speech to the European Parliament on 16 January and M. Delors outlined the thrust of the new Commission's policy in another statement to the European Parliament on 14 January. I would also refer the hon. Member to the conclusions of the European Council of 3 and 4 December. Copies of these texts are in the Library of the House.

Uganda

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Uganda concerning human rights in that country.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend met the Ugandan Minister of State for Foreign Affairs in New York on 28 September 1984 and again on 7 February last. They discussed a number of issues in our bilateral relations, including human rights.

Cyprus

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking actively to assist in concluding an agreement between the two communities in Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: We are continuing to support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General to seek a settlement to the Cyprus problem. We have been in close touch with all the parties concerned and have impressed upon them the need to seize the opportunity which the Secretary General's initiative represents. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has met President Kyprianou on several occasions over recent months and my right hon. and learned Friend met the Turkish President, Prime Minister and Foreign Minister in Ankara during his visit to Turkey this week.

Lebanon

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom policy towards Lebanon.

Mr. Luce: Our policy is to assist efforts to restore the unity, stability and prosperity of Lebanon. We have consistently called for the early, complete and orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces whose presence is not authorised by the Lebanese Government, and we continue to support the efforts of the Lebanese Government to promote national reconciliation.

El Salvador

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: We enjoy good relations with El Salvador. President Duarte's Government are publicly committed to strengthening democracy, ending human rights abuses and seeking national reconciliation. We support those objectives.

Sudan

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received calling for Government representations to the Government of Sudan about violations of human rights in that country.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has received representations from various organisations and individuals asking the Government to make representations to the Government of Sudan about violations of human rights there. The Government of Sudan are well aware of our views on human rights, which we have made clear on many occasions both at the United Nations and elsewhere.

European Community (Own Resources)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the main views under consideration in the EEC Council about the timing of the entry into force of the new own resources decision.

Mr. Luce: It was agreed at Fontainebleau that new own resources should "enter into force as soon as the ratification procedures are completed and by 1 January 1986 at the latest".

The Federal Republic of Germany considers that new own resources should not take effect until 1 January 1986.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

41. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people have been prosecuted for offences as a result of picketing during the miners' strike.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In the period to 6 February 1985, 948 persons have been proceeded against by procurators fiscal in respect of offences arising out of the present mining dispute. Owing to the manner in which statistics are compiled, this figure cannot be confined to offences arising directly out of presence on a picket line.

Warrant Sales

42. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he has yet received the final recommendations of the Law Commissioners on warrant sales and associated matters.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The recommendations referred to by the right hon. Gentleman will be contained in the report on diligence. The commission intends to complete this report by the middle of this year.

SCOTLAND

Nuclear Burst (Damage)

13. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what effect a one megaton nuclear overhead burst at a height of 300 miles would have on the equipment and resources in his care.

Mr. Ancram: The Government's policy of deterrence is designed to prevent the use of nuclear weapons. If, however, such an explosion were to occur at 300 miles it would generate a nuclear electromagnetic pulse which could damage unprotected telecommunications and electrical and electronic equipment.

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Ancram: We are awaiting the results of current research on this matter before deciding how best to protect vulnerable equipment.

British Leyland, Bathgate

14. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in his discussions with interested parties about British Leyland, Bathgate.

Mr. Alan Stewart: My officials maintain regular and close contact with Marshall Tractors and JCB, the two companies which have expressed interest in the engine plant at Bathgate. Neither company has yet submitted its proposals.

Elderly Persons

15. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will prepare and present to Parliament, for discussion, a White Paper on the care of the elderly in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I recognise the care of the elderly as a major requirement in the allocation of public sector resources in the fields of health, housing and social work. I see no need at present to revise the strategy for these services set out in the White Paper "Growing Older", which was published in March 1981.

Manufacturing Industry

17. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the loss in manufacturing jobs in Scotland since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Manufacturing employment fell by 156,000 between December 1979 and September 1984, the latest period for which estimates are available. There are indications that manufacturing employment stabilised during 1984.

Housing Associations (House Sales)

18. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to ensure that occupants of housing association houses will be permitted the right to purchase under the Tenants Rights (Scotland) Act.

Mr. Ancram: I have asked the Housing Corporation to require all associations which have not already instituted a voluntary sales scheme with discounts to reconsider, and formally report on, their policies. The responses of the associations will shortly be to hand and my right hon. Friend and I shall consider them carefully.

Housing Subsidies

19. Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total level of Government subsidy to (a) council house tenants through the housing support grant and (b) owner-occupiers through mortgage interest tax relief in Scotland in 1980; and what the equivalent figure is expected to be in 1985.

Mr. Ancram: Subsidies to council house tenants include, as well as housing support grant, rate fund contributions and the rent rebate element of housing benefit. Subsidies to council tenants totalled £343 million in 1980-81, including £228 million in housing support grant. For 1984-85 the corresponding figure is estimated at £253 million, including £63 million in housing support grant. Mortgage interest tax relief totalled £122 million in 1980-81 and is estimated to be £210 million in 1984-85.

Teachers (Pay)

20. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many teachers have taken strike action in support of the teaching unions' current campaign for an independent pay review; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: Precise figures are not available because of the selective nature of the teachers' action. It is clear, however, that the large majority of members of the unions involved have taken strike action at one time or another.

21. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received from Ayrshire parents and teachers about an independent review of the teachers' pay.

Mr. Younger: As at 8 February, approximately 300. In addition, on 1 February I met a deputation of parents from each school in my constituency.

24. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has met parents and teachers concerning selected school closures in Ayrshire as a consequence of the teachers' dispute.

Mr. Younger: I met a group of parents in Ayr on 1 February and a deputation of teachers in the House of Commons on 6 February. I made it clear that I strongly deplore strike action by teachers wherever it takes place and that the present selective tactics of the Educational Institute of Scotland are particularly unfair to the pupils concerned.

Scottish Special Housing Association

22. Mr. Lamble asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will institute an inquiry into the workings of the Scottish Special Housing Association following its decision to increase the average rents of its houses by 10 per cent.

Mr. Ancram: No. In reaching its decision on rents for the coming year, the Scottish Special Housing Association has taken due account of the deficit subsidy and of the range of rent increases advised by my right hon. Friend in December. The association has also made a balanced judgment of the need to maintain the stock in a satisfactory condition and to balance the revenue account. I can see no grounds for an inquiry on the lines proposed by the hon. Member.

Average Earnings

23. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how average earnings in Scotland compared with other economic regions of Great Britain in 1979; and what is the comparable position at the present time.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In both 1979 and 1984, Scotland ranked second in terms of average weekly earnings of males. In the case of average weekly earnings of females, Scotland ranked sixth in 1979 and third in 1984. More detailed information on actual earnings levels in Scotland and other standard regions of Great Britain is available from the published reports of the New Earnings Survey for 1979 and 1984.

Mentally Handicapped Persons

25. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take to place mentally handicapped people in Scotland on a similar basis to those in England and Wales.

Mr. Younger: In Scotland, as in England and Wales, it is the Government's policy to give priority to the needs of mentally handicapped people, whether in hospital or in the community; but it is for individual health boards and local authorities to determine what particular provision is needed to meet the needs of their respective areas.

Hospital Admissions (Cold-induced Illnesses)

26. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many admissions to hospitals have been occasioned so far this winter as a consequence of cold-induced illnesses.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

"Planning in the Countryside"

27. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will withdraw circular 40/1960 on "Planning in the Countryside" and replace it with a more up-to-date version.

Mr. Ancram: Following consultations with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the Countryside Commission for Scotland and other bodies, my officials are currently drafting an updated version of the guidance given in circular 40/1960, which I shall issue shortly.

Public Expenditure

28. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the implications for Scotland of the Government's White Paper on public expenditure.

Mr. Younger: I receive a wide range of representations, both formal and informal, about the Government's decisions on public expenditure. Details about the background to these decisions as they affect expenditure on programmes within my responsibility will be published shortly in "Public Expenditure to 1987-88: A Commentary on the Scotland Programme".

Limited List Prescribing

29. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the Government's policy concerning the availability of drugs on prescription under the National Health Service in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 8 November 1984, column 226.

32. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the representations made to him on his recent proposals on the prescription of drugs on the National Health Service.

34. Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has had from the medical profession in Scotland about the proposed restricted list of generic medicines; and how many were (a) in support of his proposals and (b) opposed to his proposals.

Mr. John MacKay: By the end of the consultation period on 31 January some 1,200 representations had been received on the proposals for a limited list of drugs. Of these, some 290 were from doctors and the remainder from a wide range of individuals and organisations. About 40 of the letters from doctors were simply circular letters supplied by the drug industry. Many doctors were concerned by specific aspects of the illustrative list issued for consultation purposes; more than half of the representations from doctors did not make it clear whether a limited list amended in accordance with their suggestions would be acceptable to them. Of the other representations received, 550 were pro forma type protest notes provided or evidently prompted by the patients' doctors. Most of the remainder expressed varying degrees of concern, in many instances about drugs which will remain available under the limited list proposals.

Inverclyde Training Centre

30. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he is making to the report, "A Future for the Inverclyde Training Centre", compiled by the Centre for Employment Initiatives, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has not received a copy of this report. I understand that it was commissioned by the Scottish Development Agency as part of the studies carried out to determine the potential for an economic initiative for the Inverclyde area. Decisions on the future use of the training centre are a matter for British Shipbuilders, and I am sure that it will take full account of the views of the agency and the local authorities.

Regional Development Policy

31. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss regional development policy.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There have been no recent discussions with the Scottish Trades Union Congress on this issue. The general council did not pursue its suggestion, to which I had agreed, that we should meet to discuss the views they submitted in the course of the regional policy review.

Manufacturing Base

33. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that the manufacturing base in Scotland is being maintained.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The nature of Scotland's manufacturing base has been changing, and I am satisfied that the newer industries will provide the basis for future growth. Manufacturing output in the first half of 1984 was 5 per cent. up on the first half of 1983, whiie output per employee also continued to increase. The latest CBI and Scottish business surveys suggest that the recovery in manufacturing continued in the second half of 1984, with business confidence, orders and output all reported to be increasing.

Health Care

35. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies his Department has carried out into the projected new demands for health care until 1988.

Mr. John MacKay: New demands for health care result from developments in medical technology, and from epidemiological and demographic changes. The Scottish Home and Health Department, in collaboration with the other United Kingdom Health Departments, keeps these various factors under continuous review. Studies of Health Service provision in relation to need are also undertaken by the Scottish Health Service Planning Council; and the council already has in mind a review of its report "Scottish Health Authorities' Priorities for the Eighties", published in 1980, to take account of all relevant changes in circumstances.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the proportions of land bought from the Forestry Commission since the passing of the Forestry Act 1981 by category of purchaser.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission does not maintain central records that carry this information, which could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Forestry Commission expects to report on the survey on the health of Norway spruce, Sitka spruce and Scots pine in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Younger: The Forestry Commission expects to be able to report the results of this survey by the middle of next month.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently unemployed in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is now available in the House of Commons Library, as was indicated in my right hon. Friend's letter of 22 October 1984 to all Scottish MPs.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table indicating the total number of men, women and young people unemployed in the Glasgow, Rutherglen constituency, showing the numbers unemployed on a ward or other geographical basis and the number who have been unemployed for six months or over, one year or over, and two years and over, respectively.

Mr. Younger: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which information is available, there were 5,247 males and 1,985 females claiming benefit in the Glasgow, Rutherglen constituency. Unemployment totals on a ward basis will not become available for a few months. Analyses by age and duration of unemployment on a constituency basis will not be available until the middle of the year.

The following table shows the number of unemployed people claiming benefit in the categories requested in the jobcentre areas of Cambuslang and Rutherglen which fall wholly or mainly within the Glasgow, Rutherglen constituency.

	Aged 18 or under			All ages
	Men	Women	Total	Men	Women	Total

Over 104 weeks	9	4	13	1,130	230	1,360

Geriatric Patients

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what increase there has been in the number of places available to geriatric patients in hospital day centres in Scotland over the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Younger: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what increase there has been in the provision of beds for geriatric patients in each regional area in Scotland in the last 12 months to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Younger: The following numbers of staffed beds were available in each health board area for elderly patients, including those with mental disability, at 31 March 1982 and at 30 September 1983, the latest dates for which these statistics are available centrally.

	Numbers at 31 March 1982	Numbers at 30 September 1983

Small Firms

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many small firms were given assistance by the Scottish Economic Planning Department and others of his Departments in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved;

(2) how many small firms in Scotland, falling within the Bolton committee definition, received regional development grants and other forms of financial assistance from his Department; and how much money was involved.

Mr. Younger: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many small firms were given financial assistance by the Scottish Development Agency in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved.

Mr. Younger: The Scottish Development Agency small business division gave financial assistance amounting to £1,666,000 to 143 small firms in the year to 31 December 1984.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many small firms were given financial assistance by the Highlands and Islands Development Board in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved.

Mr. Younger: During the 12 months 1 January 1984 to 31 December 1984 the Highlands and Islands Development Board approved £18,555,000 of financial assistance to 1,310 small firms (each employing fewer than 200 people).

Mr. Mackenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many small firms, as defined by the Bolton committee, presently exist in Scotland;

(2) how many small firms, as defined by the Bolton committee, were set up in Scotland during the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date;

(3) how many firms, as defined by the Bolton committee, went out of business during the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Younger: Comprehensive information on small firms is not available. However, information for Scotland and other regions of the United Kingdom on the stock of firms registered for value added tax, and changes in the stock by size of turnover, was published in British Business on 2 November 1984. A copy of the article has been placed in the library.

Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) who leads the Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee; and who are the other members of this committee;

(2) where the Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee meets and functions;

(3) what powers the Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee has (a) under his Department, (b) under the Scottish regional commissioner and (c) in the event of neither superior authority being effectively operational;

(4) what overlap there is between the composition of the Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee and the composition of the wartime regional government teams.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Emergency Co-ordinating Committee (formerly the Scottish Central Co-ordinating Committee) is chaired by a senior officer of the Scottish Home and Health Department. Its members are officials of a number of Government Departments and other public bodies, but those attending at any given time would depend on the nature of the peacetime emergency with which it had to deal. It has not met since 1979 but would do so, when required, in Edinburgh. Its composition and that of the wartime regional government teams reflect broadly the same range of departments and bodies, but the individual representatives would be different. In a period of tension or war its function, as in peacetime, would be to assist the Scottish Home and Health Department to co-ordinate the supply and distribution of essential supplies and services. The committee as such has no powers: its members would exercise such powers as might be delegated to them by their Ministers or employers.

It is not likely to have a role under the Scottish Regional Commission.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what figures are available to him to show the estimated proportion of electricity generated in Scotland by 1990 produced by (a) nuclear stations, (b) coal-fired stations, (c) hydro-electric stations and (d) oil-fired stations.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In 1989-90 the approximate proportions are estimated as follows:

	approximate proportions
Nuclear stations	55
Coal-fired stations	35
Hydro-electric stations	10
Oil-fired stations	0

The outturn will, of course, depend on total demand and relative fuel prices.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what figures are available to him to show estimated all-Scotland electricity demand in the years up to 1990, the maximum simultaneous demand for the year 1990 and the percentage of installed overcapacity in that year.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The preparation of demand forecasts is a matter for the Scottish electricity boards. The estimated all-Scotland electricity demand in the years up to 1989-90 is as follows:

	MW
1985-86	5,803
1986-87	5,871
1987-88	5,978
1988-89	6,046
1989-90	6,121

Notes:

(1) These figures relate to Scottish demand only and do not allow for plant used for trading with England and Wales.

(2) The figures exclude 2,000 MW of oil-fired capacity placed in reserve.

The plant additional to that required to meet the maximum demand in 1989-90 with planned security is estimated to be 21 per cent.

Salmon Netting

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last visited the Solway Firth to review salmon netting practices.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State and my hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food visited the Solway on 26 July last, where they met representatives of local fishing interests and saw salmon nets in operation. With the co-operation of the Fisheries Departments, the Annan District salmon fishery board and the North West water authority have begun discussions to see whether a system of joint management of salmon and freshwater fisheries in the Solway area might be possible.

Cash Limits

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to make any changes to his Department's cash limits in the current year.

Mr. Younger: Yes. Two cash limits on Class XV are being reduced by the amounts shown in the table. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the saving of £1·5 million on Class XV, Vote 2 (Agricultural Services and Fisheries) will be used to offset additional expenditure of £5·524 million on agricultural support schemes, which falls on Class XV, Vote 1; and the saving of £1·107 million on Class XV, Vote 14 (prisons, hospitals and community health services) will be used to offset additional expenditure of the same amount on the family practitioner services in Scotland, which falls on Class XV, Vote 20.

Vote	Existing cash limit	Reduction	Revised cash limit
XV, 2	62,008	1,500	60,508
XV, 14	1,452,569	1,107	1,451,462

SOCIAL SERVICES

Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total cost of the administration of his Department, expressed in constant prices, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Fowler: The real running costs of the Department of Health and Social Security excluding capital expenditure were:

	Cost terms 1983-84 prices £ million
1979-80	1,222
1980-81	1,288
1981-82	1,339
1982-83	1,372
1983-84	1,346

The basis of allocating costs has changed over the period so that figures for different years are not directly comparable.

The corresponding figures for the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys are:

	£ million
1979-80	30
1980-81	36
1981-82	*61
1982-83	33
1983-84	30

* Census year.

Home Helps

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of people currently in receipt of assistance from the home-help system.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on 16 January at column 166.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to encourage the training of suitable unemployed applicants to assist home helps.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans for schemes of this kind.

Medication (Costs)

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in the last year for which figures are available, how much was spent by the National Health Service on (a) cough medicine, (b) sleeping pills, (c) appetite-suppressants, (d) vitamins, (e) tranquillisers, (f) sticking plasters, (g) false teeth, (h) aspirin, (i) free contraceptives and contraceptive counselling, (j) free eyesight tests and (k) ambulance services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have full information in the form requested. For pharmaceutical services, the following are estimates based on a one in 200 sample of prescriptions dispensed by chemists' establishments in 1983:

Net ingredient cost to National Health Service (England)

	£'000
Expectorants and cough suppressants	14,195
Hypnotics	23,913
Appetite suppressants	468
Vitamin preparations	7,374
Sedatives and tranquillisers	23,050
Plasters	1,458
Anti-inflammatory drugs other than steroids	118,529

We are not able to give corresponding estimates for expenditure in the hospital and community health services.

The cost of false teeth to the National Health Service in England is estimated at £72·2 million in 1983-84. For contraceptive services, fees paid to general medical practitioners, together with the basic ingredient cost of medicines and devices prescribed and the cost of family planning clinics are estimated at some £67 million in 1983-84.

For eyesight tests and ambulance services, the 1983-84 accounts of health authorities in England show expenditure as:

	£ million
Payments to ophthalmic opticians and ophthalmic medical practitioners for testing of sight	72·2
Ambulance services	233·6

Separate figures are not available for expenditure on sight tests carried out in hospitals.

Overseas Volunteers (Benefits)

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when Her Majesty's Government expect to implement proposals that returning volunteers from developing countries should not lose title to contributory benefits simply because of their service overseas.

Mr. Newton: The class 1 (employed persons) contributions which many volunteers are liable to pay for their first 52 weeks abroad count towards the full range of contributory benefits. Those volunteers who satisfy the conditions for paying class 2 (self employed) contributions, and pay them, maintain their basic pension cover as well as earning title to most contributory benefits (but not unemployment benefit). Those volunteers who are not liable to pay class 1, or who do not pay class 2, contributions can usually pay class 3 (voluntary) contributions to maintain basic pension rights. A proposal to give further help to volunteer development workers who are unemployed when they return to this country is being considered but no decision has yet been taken.

Drugs (Side Effects)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about which drugs, prescribed under the National Health Service, are specified in the British Data Sheet as having side-effects significantly at variance with those specified by the United States Food and Drugs Administration.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A record of variations between United Kingdom data sheets and broadly similar documents in other countries is not kept. We are, however, informed by the World Health Organisation of major changes to warnings about medicines. These are considered by the Licensing Authority, which can take advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines, and which, where appropriate, will seek changes to the United Kingdom data sheets.

NHS (Clearing Bank Services)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will review the arrangements for the provision of clearing bank services to the National Health Service which presently provide no opportunity for competitive tendering.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A review of National Health Service banking arrangements has just been completed. The report contains a number of recommendations including a proposal to introduce competitive tendering. We will announce decisions on these recommendations in due course.

Retirement Pension

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretay of State for Social Services if he will give the percentage increase in the state retirement pension and the pensioners' price index since (a) 1983, (b) 1979, (c) 1974 and (d) 1970.

Mr. Whitney: The table shows the increase in the retirement pension and pensioner prices indices from the uprating dates in 1983, 1979 and 1974 to November 1984, the latest uprating date. Since there was no uprating in 1970 the figures for 1969 and 1971 have been included.

	Percentage Increase
	RP Single	RP Couple	PPI Single	PPI Couple
November 1969	616·0	607·4	428·1	423·7
September 1971	496·7	490·7	350·3	348·9
July 1974	258·0	258·1	229·2	226·7
November 1979	53·6	53·6	49·1	48·9
November 1983	5·1	5·1	4·4	4·5

Notes:
RP=Retirement Pension
PPI Single=One-person pensioner household index
PPI Couple=Two-person pensioner household index

Supplementary Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people, including dependants, who qualify for supplemetary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: 4·3 million people were in receipt of supplementary benefit for themselves and their dependants, together totalling 7·2 million people, at December 1983.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether, following his consultations, he intends to include distalgesic in his limited list of medicines prescribable under the National Health Service;

(2) which of the medicines on his current limited list are antacids having the same balanced action as gelusil, now available on prescription under the National Health Service;

(3) whether, following his consultations, he intends to include gelusil or any other aluminium and magnesium combination antacids in his limited list of medicines prescribable under the National Health Service;

(4) which of the medicines on his current limited list provide the same degree of relief from pain as a combination of dextropropoxyphene and paracetamol.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are currently considering the advice received on our limited list proposals from the Chief Medical Officer's panel of independent experts, who have taken into account the results of widespread consultation. We will shortly be making an announcement on the contents of the limited list to be introduced on 1 April.

Children (Part-time Employment)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures on the number of children under the age of 16 years in paid part-time employment in (a) Leeds metropolitan district council area and (b) West Yorkshire county council area.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further heating payments for severe weather are to be made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Chief Adjudication Officer has advised local adjudication officers that the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in regulation 26 of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulation was satisfied in parts of England and Wales in weeks ending 12 and 19 January. Claimants in the areas affected will be able to claim help with fuel bills covering periods including that week or weeks. I understand that, on the basis of the published criteria, the Chief Adjudication Officer has decided not to advise that the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in the regulation was satisfied in any part of Great Britain last week. It is too early to say whether the condition will be satisfied in any part of the country this week.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown of the number of abortions performed in England and Wales on resident women according to the statutory grounds on which those abortions were performed in each of the following years: 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and what was the total number of abortions performed on such women in each of those years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 367-68]: I regret my previous answer contained several errors in the captions from year 1974 onward. The revised reply is:

Information and Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why he does not collect information on information and statistics known to be collected by regional health authorities;

(2) whether he will list in the Official Report the statistics and information he requires regional health authorities to collect but which are not made available centrally.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 610-11]: We see no purpose in collecting information about information we do not expect to use.

Benefits and Pensions (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of claimants of unemployment and supplementary benefits and pensions in the west midlands region in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 736]: Figures showing the number of claimants receiving unemployment and supplementary benefits and pensions in the west midlands region as at May each year from 1980 are as follows:

Written Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Medical Research Council

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of funding of the Medical Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is advised on the level of funding for the research councils by the Advisory Board for Research Councils. Following their advice, the allocations to the Medical Research Council in recent years have broadly maintained the council's share of the science budget at a constant proportion.

The hon. Member will be aware that for 1985-86 there will be an injection of new money of £11 million into the science budget; the Medical Research Council's share will be £2·1 million.

Oxford University

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average salary of lecturers at Oxford university; and what information he has about the average college stipend received by such lecturers.

Mr. Brooke: The average annual salary of non-clinical academic staff, paid wholly from general university funds, at Oxford university in the academic year 1983-84 was £11,800; my right hon. Friend has no information on the average college stipend received by such staff.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the private endowments to the colleges and the university are taken into account in the calculation of grant from his Department for Oxford university.

Mr. Brooke: The University Grants Committee and the Government both wish to encourage universities to increase their income from private sources. Universities that attract additional income whether by endowment or otherwise do not thereby suffer a reduction in grant. Endowment income has not been a factor in determining the distribution of recurrent grant to individual institutions since the quinquennial system was abandoned, except to the extent that such income is already implicitly taken into account in the historic baseline.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many lecturers are currently employed at Oxford university.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983-84 the latest year for which figures are available, there were 1,318 full-time academic staff at Oxford university paid wholly from general university funds. In addition there were 732 full-time academic staff who were not wholly university financed and 93 part-time academic staff.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many undergraduates are currently attending Oxford university.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983-84 the latest year for which figures are available, there were 9,350 full-time and 104 part-time undergraduates at Oxford university.

Natural Environment Research Council

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the Natural Environment Research Council over its corporate plan; and if he is satisfied that the Natural Environment Research Council is not strengthening its administrative corps to the detriment of environmental and geological survey work.

Mr. Brooke: While my right hon. Friend has not himself discussed the Natural Environment Research Council's corporate plan with the council, I have recently met the chairman twice to discuss it with him. I am satisfied that the council is not acting in the way described in the second part of the question.

Student Unions

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further representations he has received in favour of the abolition of automatic membership of student unions.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) on 12 February, at column 114.

Teachers (Industrial Action)

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has been asked for any advice by local education authorities concerning their response to industrial action by teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No. A local authority's response to industrial action by its employees will depend on a variety of factors including the nature of the action and the employees' terms and conditions of service. The National Union of Teachers contends that school teachers are not contractually bound to stand in for absent colleagues. What a teacher is contractually bound to do as part of his job depends upon the express and implied terms of the contract of employment between him and his employer. It is for those parties to interpret the contract in the first instance: in the event of dispute it must be for the courts ultimately to decide. The question cannot be resolved, as the National Union of Teachers contend, by reference to a quotation from a letter written by my noble Friend, Baroness Young in 1979. In this letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) dated 1 November 1979 and dealing with the effects on a particular school of a dispute between Surrey county council and the local teachers' associations, my noble Friend concluded that this was not a matter in which the Secretary of State could intervene under the provisions of the Education Act 1944 and wrote that "the teachers are not contractually bound to stand in for absent colleagues and they are not in breach of any statutory duty in refusing to do so."

However, my noble Friend wrote again on this matter on 2 April 1980. This letter concluded as follows:

"I said in my letter of 1 November that teachers were not contractually bound to stand in for absent teachers. I based this view on the fact that as I understood it there is no written requirement in the contract of teachers in Surrey nor I understand in most local authorities, which specifically requires them to provide cover. I understand that a copy of my letter has subsequently been used by teachers in the Midlands who are seeking to demonstrate that teachers generally are not contractually bound in this way.

Surrey County Council have asked me to make it quite clear that in their view, in certain circumstances, failure on the part of a teacher to provide cover could be regarded as a breach of the teacher's contract despite the fact that there is no specific reference to cover in the written contract. The teacher's liability would apparantly depend on whether the instruction to provide the cover was itself reasonable, given the circumstances in the school at the time and the past practice in the particular school."

We offer this account for the record to avoid risk of misunderstanding based on the limited version apparently circulated by the National Union of Teachers.

Handicapped Children

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has reached a decision on the report presented to him by the Voluntary Council for Handicapped Children on the need for a national advisory committee on special educational needs; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Voluntary Council for Handicapped Children has performed a valuable service in preparing the report. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have concluded that it is not necessary to establish an advisory committee in order to safeguard and to promote the interests of pupils with special educational needs. I have written as follows to the Senior Officer of the Voluntary Council for Handicapped Children:

Mrs Philippa Russell
Senior Officer
Voluntary Council for Handicapped Children
8 Wakley Street
London EC1V 7QE

14 February 1985

Dear Mrs. Russell,

Thank you for your letter of 29 June enclosing a copy of the report "A National Advisory Committee for Special Educational Needs?" Nicholas Edwards and I are grateful to the Voluntary Council for Handicapped Children for the valuable service they have performed in preparing this thorough review of the question.

As the report makes clear, most of the organisations consulted by your working party felt the need for some type of national body in this field. So far as the replies were specific however there was considerable variation in the views expressed about the nature and the functions of such a body. It therefore fell to the working party to consider a number of possible options and the report recommends the establishment of a body whose functions would be rather different from those of the former Advisory Committee on Handicapped children. Its main task would abe to monitor the implementation of the 1981 Education Act and the ideas underlying it, to promote interdisciplinary co-operation, and to help to overcome difficulties. The Committee would also offer advice to the Secretaries of State; and would promote research and development, publish reports and hold seminars and conferences. The report estimates the Committee's annual budget at about £150,000.

We have looked very carefully at each of these functions and are not convinced that the case has been made for creating an Advisory Committee. To take first the question of monitoring the implementation of the 1981 Act: this Act imposes certain duties on local education authorities and other statutory authorities and has some implications for voluntary bodies. The responsibility for ensuring that these functions are carried out properly rests firmly with Ministers who have the machinery — their Departments and HM Inspectorates—for obtaining information and advice. Clearly we shall need to draw on other sources from time to time but it is clear that the Secretaries of State do not need an additional national agency for this purpose; and to create one would run the risk of confusing lines of responsibility. It is true that the written evidence submitted to the working party drew attention to problems experienced in the early stages of implementing the 1981 Act. Many of these, however seem to arise from a lack of co-operation at local level between statutory authorities—a problem which the Warnock Committee had identified under the previous arrangements—and it seems to us that a solution to this sort of problem is more likely to be achieved by the efficient working of appropriate machinery at local and regional levels rather than by a national committee. It was inevitable that there should have been some difficulties in the early stages of the implementation of the 1981 Act, particularly in view of the changed obligations imposed on local authorities. As you probably know the Government have commissioned a research project by the University of London Institute of Education on developments following the 1981 Act, which is due to produce its report in 1986. There would, we think, be a real danger of confusion if another Government sponsored body were also looking at the implementation of the 1981 Act.

The second function envisaged for the Committee would be the traditional one of offering advice to Ministers. Although Ministers have their "in house" advisers there are many occasions when we need to sound the opinions of a wider group of people outside the Departments; and when the outside interests feel the need to let us know their views. It is however not clear to us how the creation of a committee, by itself, would add to our ability to obtain advice from our Departments, HM Inspectorates and the voluntary organisations. We already have a great deal of direct contact with the voluntary organisations which I know they value. If the voluntary organisations wish to approach Ministers, either individually, or collectively through organisations such as your own, they know they are welcome to do so. It is not at all clear that the interests of either side would be served by interposing between us a small body of individuals faced with the task of trying to interpret often widely varying views and trying to achieve sufficient common ground to give advice to Ministers.

If the Government needs advice on a particular topic, it is always open to them to establish a committee for a particular purpose. It is perhaps significant that the major reports on handicapped children were made, not by the Standing Advisory Committee on Handicapped Children, but by groups set up for a specific purpose.

The third broad function envisaged for the Advisory Committee would be to promote research and development. Once again the question arises as to what an Advisory Committee could do that is not capable of being done already through other channels. At present the Departments and the voluntary bodies commission research; the Departments, HM Inspectorate, local education authorities and voluntary bodies hold seminars and conferences. At the beginning of this year the Department of Education and Science had allocated over £800,000 for research into children with special educational needs. A further £300,000 has now been allotted for curriculum work. It is doubtful whether an Advisory Committee could argue that a larger share of the research budget should be devoted to this field. Most of these research projects are carried out by university departments or institutes of education since that is where the expertise lies. An Advisory Committee would not be able to carry out the research itself and would need to commission it from other bodies. It would rely heavily, as do the Departments, on reports produced by HM Inspectorate and on seminars held by the Inspectorate to publicise good practice.

Nicholas Edwards and I believe that it was right for the Government to provide financial support to enable this question to be reviewed by an independent body: and I was grateful for the opportunity to discuss the report with Lady Faithfull and others. We are, however, not convinced that the case has been made out for the establishment of an Advisory Committee at this time. This does not, however, rule out the possibility that we may wish to reconsider the position later; given that a number of the initiatives mentioned in this letter are due to produce results in the latter part of 1986, the time for a review might be two or three years from now.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Lady Faithfull, Mr. Hannam MP and Mr. Cooke.

Yours sincerely,
Keith Joseph.

WALES

Psychiatric Hospitals (Detainees)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many persons in Wales were ordered to be held in psychiatric hospitals under the provisions of the Mental Health Acts during 1984, or the most recent year for which figures are available; and what is the total number of such persons detained under orders in Wales at present.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Figures for 1984 are not yet available. Those for the previous year are set out in the following table. Further information on admissions is to be found in section 7 of the Mental Health Statistics for Wales No. 4 1984, copies of which are in the Library.

Tourism

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the projects of the Welsh Development Agency's service industries division being considered for financial support are related to tourism.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Welsh Development Agency is not at present considering investment in any companies with projects related to tourism. However, it is considering proposals for a number of special projects which would be designed to use public funds to attract private investment in tourism. These activities would be complementary to those of the Wales tourist board, Mid-Wales Development and local authorities.

Disabled Students

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will review the facilities for disabled students in those colleges in Wales which come under his Department, and where necessary seek improvements in co-operation with the college authorities.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: It is the responsibility of the education authorities and others providing educational buildings to make provision for disabled students. My right hon. Friend has no plans for undertaking a review of the facilities in all colleges in Wales. However in carrying out inspections of colleges Her Majesty's Inspectors take note of the facilities provided for the disabled and where necessary draw attention to any inadequacies. In such cases the authority responsible for the college is asked to say what improvements it proposes to make in the light of the inspectorate's report.

Housing Starts

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of housing starts in Wales in (a) the public and (b) the private sector from 1979 to the latest available date.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information for the period 1979 to 1983 is published in "Welsh Housing Statistics" (Nos. 1-4) copies of which are available in the library. Provisional estimates for 1984 are for 1,200 starts in the public sector and 5,200 in the private sector.

Council Housing

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of council houses to be built in Wales in 1985 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is estimated that 1,600 local authority dwellings will be completed during 1985. A reliable estimate for 1986 is not currently available.

M4 (Repairs)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to arrange for repairs to a small area of badly pitted road surface which presently constitutes a danger to traffic on the westbound carriageway between junctions 31 and 32 of the M4 in Wales; if, in the interval before the repair work is completed, he will cause appropriate warning signs to be erected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There is some deterioration in the surface of the westbound carriageway at a point about three and a half miles east of the Coryton junction (No. 32). Remedial works will take place as soon as weather conditions permit. The present condition of the carriageway does not warrant the use of warning signs, but the situation is being carefully monitored.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many 1960s-built deck-access flats or maisonettes there are in Wales; and (a) how many are currently unoccupied due to repairs or renovation work and (b) if he will estimate the amount of money needed to repair these dwellings.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are approximately 1,300 deck access dwellings built in the 1960s in Wales. Information on the numbers currently unoccupied is not held centrally.

Homeless People

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many homeless people there are per 1,000 households in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Mid-Glamorgan and (d) Clwyd for the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: For Wales, Mid-Glamorgan and Clwyd the rates requested for 1983 were 13, 18 and 7 respectively where homeless people are defined as persons in households accepted by the local authorities as being homeless. I refer the hon. Gentleman to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for the comparable figure for England.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the breakdown for each year since 1979 of the numbers of households accepted as homeless by Welsh local authorities; and what type of accommodation was made available for them, giving numbers of those housed in hostels, caravans, council houses or returned to relatives per each year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is give in the following table:

Households accepted as homeless

	Type of action taken by local authority:
	Placed in hostels	Placed in caravans	Placed in local authority dwellings	Placed with relatives/friends	*Other	Total number accepted as homeless

Cefn Mably Hospital

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 11 February, Official Report, what is the proposed after use for Cefn Mably hospital in respect of which an application for regional selective assistance has been made.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I cannot add to the answer I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 11 February 1985 at column 50.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mrs. Peacock asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the proposed reforms of the legal aid system; and if he has any plans to extend legal aid to libel cases.

The Attorney-General: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the proposals put forward in the 34th Legal Aid Annual Reports. The Lord Chancellor is grateful to The Law Society and the Legal Aid Advisory Committee for their reports, and to the advisory committee for its review of the principle underlying the eligibility limits for civil and criminal legal aid and of the non-financial criteria for the grant of legal aid in both civil and criminal proceedings, which he referred to them in 1983. The Government will give careful consideration to the recommendations they make in the light of the resource and other implications. The Lord Chancellor hopes that the advisory committee's report will provide the basis for an informed discussion about the financial and non-financial criteria. The Lord Chancellor has no plans to extend legal aid to defamation proceedings.

Judges

Mr. Wainwright asked the Attorney-General what steps the Lord Chancellor takes when assessing persons for appointment as judges, to test the adequacy of their understanding of the British constitution.

The Attorney-General: Judges are selected on the basis of their professional ability, experience and standing. No specific test is appropriate; the Lord Chancellor takes into account the adequacy of candidates over a wide range of legal disciplines.

PRIME MINISTER

Journalists (Briefings)

Q11. Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will now ensure that all briefings to journalists held by her or by her officials are conducted on an attributable basis.

The Prime Minister: No.

York

Q64. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit the City of York during 1985.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Auchenshuggle

Q65. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit Auchenshuggle.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

North Mymms

Q73. Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to the parish of North Mymms.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Civil Defence

Q90. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the Government's policy on recruitment for the civil defence volunteers.

The Prime Minister: The Government are well aware of the importance of volunteer effort, particularly at community level. Action by local authorities is supported by grant aid and guidance in order to harness the potential contribution of all those citizens who wish to add their efforts to civil defence on a voluntary basis.

Basildon

Q91. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister what plans she has to visit Basildon.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 February.

Mr. Flannery asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 February.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 February.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 February.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 February.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 February.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 February.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will be having further meetings later today including one with the Prime Minister of Italy.

Vice-President Sergio Ramirez of Nicaragua

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her talks with Vice-President Sergio Ramirez of Nicaragua on 9 February.

The Prime Minister: Vice-President Ramirez called on me on 8 February at his own request. I expressed my concern about the substantial build-up of arms, troops and foreign military advisers in Nicaragua and Nicaraguan support for attempts to destabilise democratic Governments elsewhere in central America. I made clear that the Government's future relations with Nicaragua would be determined by progress towards establishing genuine democracy there, scaling down of armaments and the cessation of support for subversion.

Minister of State for the Armed Forces

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister, in the light of the evidence given in the case of R. v. Ponting, if she will now dismiss the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley).

The Prime Minister: No.

Official Secrets Act

Mr. David Young asked the Prime Minister if, in view of the acquittal of Mr. Clive Ponting, she will now initiate a revision of the Official Secrets Act to ensure that its scope is limited to matters of national security.

The Prime Minister: Considerable thought has already been given to the possible revision of section 2 of the 1911 Act, leading to the conclusion (accepted by the Franks committee) that legislation would not be adequate if it limited criminal sanctions to matters of national security. The Government will continue to give careful consideration to the views which have been or may be expressed on this issue, but I do not see the hon. Member's suggestion as providing an acceptable way forward.

Second World War (Anniversary)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Prime Minister what arrangements have been made to commemorate the end of the second world war.

The Prime Minister: It is our intention to hold a national commemoration which will both honour the dead and recall the reconciliation and reconstruction that has been achieved in 40 years of peace with freedom and justice. Her Majesty the Queen has graciously agreed to attend a service in Westminster abbey on 8 May in commemoration of the end of the second world war and of the sacrifices made in all the theatres of war. We shall seek the widest participation from this country of those who contributed to the victory. We shall also invite the ambassadors and high commissioners of all countries represented in London. Further details of the arrangements will be announced in due course. Last year the Government arranged for a party of widows and veterans to visit Normandy, it is also the Government's intention that a party of widows and veterans should be able to make a pilgrimage to the Far East in remembrance of husbands and comrades who died. Dates have yet to be fixed but it is hoped that it can be arranged around Remembrance Day this year. The details will be announced in due course.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Industrial Development (North-West)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many steering location inquiries had been received in the north-west region of his Department; and, of these, how many had been referred to the Cumbria county council industrial development unit during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Trippier: In January 1985 the north-west regional office received 18 steering location inquiries; one of these was referred to Cumbria county council's industry development unit. Close liaison between the regional office and the IDU continues.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is in a position to announce a revised external financing limit for the British Steel Corporation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: An EFL for BSC of £275 million in 1984-85 was announced in November 1983 and was subsequently reduced following the Budget abolition of the national insurance surcharge to £273 million. Since then, BSC and its partners have terminated an uneconomic arrangement for the production of iron ore in Canada. The total cost to BSC of these arrangements is estimated at £130 million. BSC's EFL is being increased by £70 million to £343 million on this account, the balance to be funded from savings within BSC's existing EFL. Provision for additional grant will be sought in a Spring Supplementary Estimate and the increase in the EFL charged to the reserve.

Isle of Man Steam Packet Company (Merger)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive from the Director General of Fair Trading advice on whether the proposed merger between the Isle of Man Steam Packet Company and Sealink is a qualifying merger under the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Mr. Fletcher: The proposed merger does appear to qualify for investigation under the Fair Trading Act, and the Director General will be advising on the question of reference within the next few weeks.

EC (Insurance)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the freedom provided to Common Market-based insurance companies to solicit and secure insurance business in the United Kingdom is in practice provided to United Kingdom insurance companies soliciting and securing insurance business from residents of other member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: In most other Community countries, United Kingdom insurance companies cannot obtain direct insurance business unless they are established in the country concerned. It is because we want a real common market in insurance that we are continuing to press for a liberal non-life insurance services directive and are intervening in support of the Commission in the insurance cases they are bringing before the European Court.

BL (Privatisation)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to employ external advisers on any aspects of BL privatisation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I intend to appoint a merchant bank to advise the Department on possibilities for privatising BL businesses.

BL (Strategic Objectives)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has agreed revised strategic objectives with the BL board.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. The Board's objectives are:

1. To return BL and its constituent businesses, either together or separately, to the private sector as soon as practical, while satisfying the Board's fiduciary duties. In any case where this objective cannot be achieved, the Board will review the future of that business.
2. To pursue in the Corporate Plan a specifically targeted programme of profitability improvement, within stated limits of public funding, so as to achieve a rate of return that would attract external funds on normal commercial terms without Government support.

Small Firms

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small firms, by Bolton committee definition, he has assisted by regional development grant, selective financial assistance or any other financial assistance in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved in each region of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to the reply, 13 February 1985, c. 174]: The following table sets out the schemes of assistance for which information on support for small firms is available. None of the information requested is available for regional development grants. Except where indicated, the Bolton committee definition of 200 employees has been used. Information on the amount of assistance given by region could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Houses (Isle of Wight)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proposals he has for the future occupation of empty prison houses on the Isle of Wight;

(2) how many houses built to provide accommodation for prison officers are at present empty on the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Mellor: Of 103 quarters currently vacant, 11 have been allocated to staff, 36 are being refurbished, and 18 are being sold. Thirty-eight are earmarked for future staff needs. As more become vacant they will be sold.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many notices to quit or eviction orders in respect of prison houses have been served on former prison officers or members of a prison officer's family in the Isle of Wight over the past three years.

Mr. Mellor: Fifty-one notices to quit and nine eviction orders.

Remand Centres (Suicides)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides were recorded in remand centres for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

	Number
1979	Nil
1980	2
1981	Nil
1982	Nil
1983	Nil

Licensing Laws (Scotland)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he anticipates receiving the independent report on the changes in the licensing laws in Scotland.

Mr. Mellor: This report has been commissioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I understand that he expects it to be published in the summer.

Spain (Extradition Treaty)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about progress in negotiations with Spain for a new extradition treaty.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question on 11 February from my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) at column 11.

Flats (Lighting)

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has as to the effect of vandal-proof high luminosity lighting on the crime rate associated with big inner city blocks of flats; and if he will call upon his crime prevention unit to recommend local authorities and private blocks to install high luminosity low consumption lighting on all balconies and passageways.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Although there is no conclusive research evidence, a recent report on the Department of the Environment's priority estates project concluded that improved estate lighting can deter crime and reduce tenants' fear of crime.

Last year's joint departmental circular on crime prevention issued to local authority chief executives and others, recognised the importance of improved public lighting in local preventive measures. At the request of the Home Office, the British Standards Institution is preparing a guide for architects and planners on the security of new dwellings, including estates. This is to be published later this year and is expected to include advice on lighting as a crime prevention measure. The Home Office crime prevention unit is in contact with the Institution of Public Lighting Engineers on this subject.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect the £1·5 million television and press campaign had on reducing crime in London and the Midlands last autumn.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The results of the campaign are still being evaluated.

Leicester (Rallies)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Leicestershire as to the cost of policing various rallies in Leicester on Sunday 3 February and the number of police being brought in from outside police forces; which forces were involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Leicestershire that assistance was provided by 250 officers from the Metropolitan police. I will write to my hon. Friend about the cost of the police operation as soon as the information is available.

St. Lucia (Police Visits)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis regarding the visit of chief superintendent Ron Hardy and a colleague to St. Lucia; by whom the visit was authorised; and whether the officers returned with the navigational log (helmsman's log) of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that two officers from the Metropolitan police travelled to St. Lucia last week at the request of the Director of Public Prosecutions, to whom they will be reporting on their return.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the most recent figures he has for the total number of persons who have been charged with criminal offences alleged to have been committed in Yorkshire and arising out of the miners' strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Up to 5 February the figures were as follows:

(1) Police force area	(2) Number of those charged	(3) Number of charges preferred
North Yorkshire	141	149
South Yorkshire	1,231	1,477
West Yorkshire	313	437

Note: Where the same person has been charged on different occasions, more than one entry will have been made in column (2).

Multiple Occupation Dwellings (Safety)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to promulgate the draft code of practice relating to means of escape from houses in multiple occupation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to questions from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) and my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 28 January at column 21.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received concerning means of escape in case of fire in premises in multiple occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received representations from the Liverpool city council, supported by hon. Members, about the need for early publication of the code of practice on fire safety in houses in multiple occupation. My noble Friend responded to these representations on 11 February.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have lost their lives due to fires in multiple occupied premises in each of the past five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of deaths from fires in dwellings in multiple occupation is published annually in "Fire Statistics, United Kingdom" (table 30 of the 1983 volume and corresponding tables in earlier years). Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Summer Time

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to oppose the European Economic Community recommendation to harmonise summer time throughout the Community, in view of its potential effect on the United Kingdom farming industry.

Mr. Mellor: The Government have decided, following consultation and agreement within the European Community, that for the years 1986 to 1988 the present system shall continue whereby the starting date for summertime at the end of March is common to all member countries of the Community, but the end date, during the fourth week-end in October, is four weeks later than continental member States. A draft order setting out the dates will be laid before Parliament.

Lowdham Grange Youth Custody Centre

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much leave was given to each of the two inmates of Lowdham Grange youth custody centre who were give leave to attend the funerals of friends or relatives in January.

Mr. Mellor: Eight hours and 29 hours, respectively.

Notifiable Drugs

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers identified as taking notifiable drugs in each year since 1975; if separate figures are available for Scotland; and if he will also publish them.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to persons notified to the Home Office as addicted to notifiable drugs, and figures for the United Kingdom and Scotland for the years 1978 to 1983 are given in tables 3.11 to 3.13 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs, United Kingdom, Supplementary Tables, 1983," a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The corresponding figures for 1975 to 1977 are as follows:

United Kingdom
1975	922	536	1,949

Metropolitan Police

Sir Nicholas Bonsor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the total cost to public funds of the Metropolitan Police in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: As police authority for the metropolis, I have approved estimates which provide for net revenue expenditure (as currently defined) by the Metropolitan police of £747·641 million in 1985-86, an increase of 5 per cent. on the cash limit of £711·8 million which I set for 1984-85.

I have decided, however, that an accounting change should be made to the Metropolitan police estimates to bring them into line with the Supply Estimates presented to Parliament. In future, the net revenue expenditure figure in the Metropolitan police estimates, which is the basis of the cash limit, will be calculated without reference to certain Government grants, which in 1985-86 amount to £15·543 million. Accordingly, the cash limit for 1985-86 will be set at £763·184 million. This is a purely technical adjustment to secure consistency between the two sets of estimates: it has no effect on the force's level of expenditure or on the level of precept levied on the boroughs and districts in the Metropolitan police district.

UN Decade for Women

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement about the reply given by the Government to section D of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire;

(2) if he will request the British Broadcasting Corporation and Independent Broadcasting Authority to provide him with the information required by question 2.2 of section D of part II of the United Nations End of Decade for Women questionnaire.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his replies, 12 February 1985, c. 93]: The Government's reply reflects the constitutional position that editorial and administrative decisions are matters for the broadcasting authorities alone. I shall, however, ask if they can provide the information to which the hon. Member refers and I shall write to her.

ENERGY

CEGB (Coal Purchases)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many tonnes of coal were purchased by the Central Electricity Generating Board in 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: Details of the coal delivered to the Central Electricity Generating Board are published in the board's annual report and accounts. In 1983-84 74 million tonnes of coal were delivered to the board's power stations.

Energy Statistics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of the energy market in the United Kingdom was held by (a) coal, (b) oil, (c) natural gas and (d) nuclear energy in 1950, 1960, 1970, 1980 and at the nearest available date in 1984.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Energy consumption figures on a primary fuel input basis are set out below. Those for 1984 are provisional.

Combined Heat and Power (Newcastle upon Tyne)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give his reasons for not allocating lead city status in the combined heat and power scheme to Newcastle upon Tyne; and whether this decision was based soley on the strength of the submission by that city.

Mr. David Hunt: In the reply of 25 January 1985 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) at column 547 my right hon. Friend listed the criteria which were taken into account in arriving at the decision to offer grant support.

North-Eastern Electricity Board

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the reason for the delay in the publication of his Department's report on the investigation by the North-Eastern electricity board into its responsibilities for the accuracy and operation of time switches used in the supply of dual tariff to domestic customers.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department has not been asked to investigate or report on this matter.

Petroleum

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list, for each major grade, imports of petroleum into the United Kingdm for each month in 1984;

(2) if he will list, for each major grade, exports of petroleum from the United Kingdom in each month of 1984 (a) in barrels and (b) in value.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Information of the type requested is not readily available. Information about the amounts and values of petroleum imported to and exported from the United Kingdom under major category headings is however available in "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the increase or decrease in oil production in Britain for each month in 1984.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested is given in the following table:

SCOTLAND

Blind and Partially Sighted Persons

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will institute and maintain an official register of blind and partially sighted persons.

Mr. Younger: The present informal arrangements for the maintenence of information about blind persons by local authorities, or by voluntary agencies acting on their behalf, appear to work satisfactorily. The position remains subject to review, but I see no case for altering the existing practice meanwhile.

Trout Protection

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when a decision will be made on the request for a trout protection order, currently being sought for the Tay system under the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976.

Mr. John MacKay: It is not possible to indicate when such a decision may be taken. Draft proposals for a protection order for the River Tay were discussed informally at a meeting between representatives of the proposers and the Consultative Committee on Freshwater Fisheries on 25 September 1984. A formal application has not yet been received.

Fish Stocks

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set up a committee of inquiry, under independent chairmanship, to consider the decrease in migratory and indigenous fish stocks and its implications for conservation and the Scottish economy.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend does not consider that there are circumstances to justify the setting up of such a committee of inquiry at this time.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps his Department is taking to halt the decrease of migratory fish stocks brought about by excessive exploitation by commercial concerns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Catch statistics published by my right hon. Friend's Department for the period since 1952 show substantial year to year variations in catches of migratory fish. The position varies from year to year but, for the country as a whole, it is the netting catch that has fluctuated; the rod and line catch has been relatively steady. There is no evidence of a decrease in stocks through excessive exploitation by legal netting methods.

A number of measures have been taken to try to improve runs of fish to Scottish rivers. These include a permanent ban on drift netting, increased efforts to reduce poaching and a reduction of the quotas of salmon to be taken in Greenland and the Faroes.

Forestry Policy

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the objectives of national forestry policy.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the statement on forestry policy made to the House by my right hon. Friend on 10 December 1980.

Stephen Anthony Godden

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report on the allegations of ill-treatment made by Stephen Anthony Godden of Orpington, Kent, while in police custody at Perth, as detailed in the letter he has received from the hon. Member for Orpington.

Mr. Ancram: I am making inquiries into the circumstances described in my hon. Friend's letter of 10 February and will write to him as soon as possible.

Hypothermia Thermometers

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) why the hypothermia thermometers issued to old people during the winter of 1983-84 have been withdrawn; what savings have resulted from this; and what plans he has to reintroduce them;

(2) how many Scottish Health Education Group packages, "Keep Warm This Winter", were printed in 1983-84 and 1984-85; and how many are currently available for old people.

Mr. John MacKay: Ten thousand "Keep Warm This Winter" packages were assembled by the Scottish Health Education Group in 1983-84 and in 1984-85. The packages are made up of leaflets produced by a variety of organisations and are distributed through health boards and other appropriate organisations. I am unable to say how many are still available throughout Scotland.

No hypothermia thermometers have been withdrawn. Supplies were not available in time for inclusion in the packages this year, but some 2,300 were subsequently distributed. The group hopes to issue packages, including thermometers, next winter.

Police (Drug Squads)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the police forces in Scotland which have set up special drug squads.

Mr. Ancram: Of the eight police forces in Scotland, Grampian, Lothian and Borders, Northern, Strathclyde and Tayside have drug squads. Fife constabulary is in the process of establishing a squad and in the remaining two forces — Dumfries and Galloway and Central — designated officers are responsible for collating and disseminating intelligence on drugs matters.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers of charges preferred under the Misuse of Drugs Act by each police force in Scotland in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The table shows the number of drugs offences cleared up by the police for the years 1979 to 1983. The classification of crimes and offences used by my Department does not separately identify the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 but includes in the relevant category various other statutes dealing with misuse of drugs.

Farm Prices

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to meet the President and Executive of the National Farmers Union of Scotland to discuss the European Economic Community Commission proposals for farm prices for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, together with other Agriculture Ministers, met representatives of the National Farmers Union on 6 February to discuss the Commission's proposals for this year's price fixing. A further meeting is likely to be held in the next few weeks.

Farming (Capital Grants)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the farming industry in Scotland on the cuts in capital grants; and what action he proposes to take on the matter.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State recently met the president of the Scottish National Farmers Union. In addition, representations have been received from a number of branches of the union and from a small number of farmers and agricultural contractors. These representations will be borne in mind in drawing up the scheme to implement the EC farm structures policy, currently being negotiated in Brussels.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now restore to farmers in the less favoured areas the capital grants to their former level for draining, fencing and re-seeding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: No. The Government fully acknowledge the importance of these activities but consider that the revised rates of grant, allied to the good rate of return which, for example, sound drainage provides, still provide a worthwhile incentive.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the loss to farm incomes for the current year of the capital grants cuts made by Her Majesty's Government on the farming industry; if he will estimate the combined effect of these cuts together with the higher level of interest rates on the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The changes in the capital grant schemes announced in December 1984 are expected to provide savings of £5 million in Scotland in 1985-86. They carry no direct implicationfor farm incomes. The overall effect of the changes on future investment levels or costs cannot at present be estimated.

Variable Premium Scheme

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is his intention to retain the existing variable premium scheme for cattle and sheep.

Mr. John MacKay: It is our intention to press for the continuation of the beef variable premium in the 1985 CAP price fixing negotiations.

The European Commission is not proposing that we discontinue our sheep variable premium scheme, nor do we envisage the scheme's removal. At the price fixing we will therefore seek to secure improvements in the regime and the removal of elements in the Commission's proposals which would discriminate against our producers.

Annual Ewe Premium

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when Her Majesty's Government and the European Economic Community Commission propose to implement the decision of the Agricultural Council in March 1984 to make an advance payment of 30 per cent. of the annual ewe premium for 1984-85 to producers in less favoured areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The European Commission has not yet published its regulation authorising the 30 per cent.

advance payment of the annual ewe premium for the 1984-85 marketing year. Payments will issue immediately the rate has been confirmed.

I hope that the regulation will be published within the next few days.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases were reported to the Forestry Commission in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date of broadleaved woodland felling being carried out without felling licences when a felling licence was required by law; what was the total area so felled in each period; and how many prosecutions resulted from these cases in each period.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	Number of Cases	Area (hectares)	Number of Prosecutions
Year to 31 March 1983:	19	46	9
Year to 31 March 1984:	37	298	14
Period of 9 months to December 1984:	9	25	1

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for felling licences for broadleaved woodlands clearance were rejected by the Forestry Commission in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date against the advice of the agriculture ministries and departments.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EC (Aid)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total amount of European Community aid received by (a) Strathclyde regional council, (b) Glasgow district council and (c) private organisations in Glasgow, up to the most recently available date.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Drug Abusers (Hospital Beds)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the number of beds in Scottish hospitals allocated for special use for drug abusers and (b) the proportion these beds are of total beds in Scottish hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: No beds in mental hospitals or psychiatric units are designated specifically for drug misuse patients. If a consultant psychiatrist decides that it is necessary to admit a drug misuser to hospital, he will utilise one of the psychiatric beds at his disposal.

Drug Clinics

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of drug clinics in Scottish hospitals; and where in Scotland they are located.

Mr. John MacKay: Hospital-based treatment for drug misusers is usually provided as part of the out-patient service available at all mental hospitals and psychiatric units, but there are three hospital-based clinics in Scotland providing services specifically for drug misusers. These are at the Southern general and Woodilee hospitals, Glasgow, and at Ninewells hospital, Dundee.

Drug Misusers (Services)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the projects in Scotland allocated funds as part of the central initiative to improve services for drug misusers.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) on 9 April 1984 at columns 32-33.

Dental Undergraduates

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new dental undergraduates were admitted for dental education in Scotland in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of students admitted to the Scottish dental schools in the academic years 1983-84 and 1984-85 were 181 and 161, respectively. The 1984-85 figure is provisional.

Bonnybridge/Denny Morbidity Review

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish the report of the Bonnybridge/Denny morbidity review under the chairmanship of Professor Lenihan.

Mr. Younger: I have arranged that the report of Professor Lenihan's independent review group will be published today. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library and will also be available from the Scottish Office.

The outcome of Professor Lenihan's independent review is that the general state of human, animal and plant health in the Bonnybridge/Denny area is normal. In particular, there is no evidence of a raised incidence of cancer nor of unusual morbidity effects which can be attributed to the chemical incineration plant in the area operated by Re-Chem International Ltd. Further investigation of the incidence of congenital eye defects in young children in the area is recommended, but the Lenihan group has found no evidence to suggest that these are individually anything more than the congenital defects of this type which occur throughout the country, albeit in small numbers.

The report's recommendations are being studied carefully and I shall be acting promptly on those that concern me. The public in general should be reassured by the findings of the Lenihan report. I am most grateful to Professor Lenihan and his colleagues for the time and energy they have devoted to this important review and for producing their conclusions with commendable promptness.

THE ARTS

Croxteth Hall, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts how many representations the Minister for the Arts has received about the future of Croxteth hall, Liverpool; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Speke Hall, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts how many representations the Minister for the Arts has received about the future of Speke hall, in Liverpool; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Philharmonic Hall, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts how many representations the Minister for the Arts has received about the future of the Philharmonic hall, in Liverpool; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

Power Presses (Injury Statistics)

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have suffered injury by way of amputation, crushing, or associated injuries from power presses, whether hydraulic, pneumatic, mechanical or otherwise, in each year from 1961 to date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information is not available in the form requested. In particular it is not possible, without incurring disproportionate cost, to give details about the nature of injuries received. However, using the legal definition for power presses given in the Power Presses Regulations 1965 (which includes mechanical machines with a flywheel and clutch mechanism and mechanical press brakes but excludes hydraulic and pneumatic machines) the following figures for accidents are available.

In addition there were 51 accidents in 1974 and 13 in 1983 at the tools of metalworking hydraulic presses and 28 accidents in 1974 at the tools of metalworking pneumatic presses.

Figures for other years are not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many redundancy notifications were given for each of the last 12 months for which figures are available in the Burnley travel-to-work area.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many redundancies in (a) the textile industry, (b) machine tool engineering, (c) general engineering, (d) service trades and (e) steel fabrication work were made in the last month for which statistics are available in the Workington travel-to-work area;

(2) how many redundancy notifications were given during the last month for which statistics are available in the Workington travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: A provisional total of 40 redundancies were confirmed by the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in jobcentre areas approximating to the Workington-travel-to-work area in December 1984, the latest month for which statistics are available. Of these, 32 were in other manufacturing industries (SIC 1980, class 49) and eight were in metal manufacture (class 22). There were no advance notifications of redundancies involving 10 or more workers in December.

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the travel-to-work areas in Great Britain where male unemployment exceeds 25 per cent.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is available in the House of Commons Library.

Income Maintenance

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Emploment what is his latest estimate of the current price costs in 1983-84 and 1984-85 in England, Scotland and Wales of all income maintenance payments and allowances for which his Department is responsible, distinguishing between the different schemes involved, showing the rates of allowance paid in each case, and also showing the full cost of each scheme, with sub-totals for administration.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The income maintenance and allowances in 1983-84 for which the Department of Employment is responsible, together with the costs of each scheme and sub-totals for administration are as follows:

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Arrangements that accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the number of entrants to the youth training scheme in 1983-84.

Mr. Peter Morrison: During 1983-84, the Manpower Services Commission compiled figures of the number of entrants to the youth training scheme by a manual information system. The monthly figures of the number of entrants produced by this system consisted only of the entrants about whom information was received in the month concerned. These figures, which produced a total of 353,979 entrants for the year, have been published by the commission previously.

The commission has now put the information about entrants into a computer system and has reallocated each entrant to the month in which he or she actually started training. The computer system also includes 16,241 entrants who commenced training in 1983-84 but about whom information was not received until after 31 March 1984 and who had not been included in the figures produced by the manual system. The actual total number of entrants to the scheme in 1983-84 is thus 370,220.

The table shows the monthly cumulative figures of entrants produced by the computer system and the comparable figures produced by the manual system:

Month	Cumulative recorded entrants to YTS*
	Computer System†	Manual System‡
1983
April	11,712	2,572
May	17,100	6,845
June	38,439	21,228
July	65,950	45,874
August	123,074	88,334
September	231,809	169,478
October	280,173	246,817
November	303,598	286,900
December	313,141	304,309
1984
January	333,150	325,014
February	344,452	342,317
March	352,246	353,979
Total for year (with addition of Construction Industry Training Board entrants to the Computer system total)	370,220	353,979

Notes:
* These figures represent the actual number of scheme starts including some second and subsequent starts where trainees have transferred between schemes.
† The monthly figures do not include 17,974 Construction Industry Training Board entrants who were included in the manual system but who could not be included in the computer system.
‡ These figures do not include information about 16,241 entrants which was not received until after 31 March 1984.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those pesticide products used in wood treatment which contain (a) dieldrin, (b) DDT, (c) Lindane, (d) tributyl tin oxide or similar compounds and (e) benzene hexachloride.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 12 February 1985, c. 136-7]: The Health and Safety Executive knows of no pesticide products used in wood treatment which contain either DDT or benzene hexachloride. Dieldrin is used in the pre-treatment of timber but is no longer approved for products used by householders or by firms specialising in wood treatment in situ. Lindane is the most commonly used insecticide marketed for wood treatment and tributyl tin oxide is one of the most commonly used fungicides. There are well over 200 products containing lindane or tributyl tin oxide or both, with frequent changes in the names of products and their constituents.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Salaries and Allowances

Mr. McGuire asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the number of officers, officials and staff of the House who are currently being paid a higher salary than a Back-Bench Member of Parliament, if he will give a breakdown of this number by grade or job description in each of the Departments of the House; and if he will give on the same basis details of any allowances being paid, on a daily, weekly, monthly or annual basis, and the reasons for such allowances.

Mr. Beith: The number and job titles of staff employed by the House of Commons Commission, with an annual rate, or on a salary scale which includes certain points exceeding £16,904, are given in the chart. The rates and scales quoted are those payable from 1 October 1984 except those indicated* which have been payable since 1 November 1984. All scales include £1,300 per annum inner London weighting allowance, except that no such allowance is payable to those indicated.†

The numbers of staff shown include some staff in grades with a salary scale exceeding £16,904 per annum who may individually be receiving an annual salary below that amount. Moreover, there are some staff not shown who receive a basic salary of less than £16,904 per annum but whose total emoluments, including overtime, night work payments or other extra duty allowances, and so on, may exceed that figure. Details of individuals in both categories could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Details of the allowances, in the nature of pay, currently being paid to certain staff in receipt of annual salaries exceeding £16,904 are also given:

Trade Union Members

Mr. Rhodes James asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission how many staff of the House are members of trades unions; to which unions they belong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith: The six trade unions operating within departments of the House are the Association of First Division Civil Servants, Civil and Public Services Association, Civil Service union, Hotel and Catering Workers' Union — part of the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades union — Institution of Professional Civil Servants, and the Society of Civil and Public Servants. About 590 staff out of the total of approximately 920—about 64 per cent.—are thought to be members of these unions.

TRANSPORT

Highway Construction Programmes

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department monitors local authorities' highway construction programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We rely on local authorities' returns to the Department of the Environment for overall figures for their capital expenditure on road construction. Authorities provide information about their road construction programmes to my Department through their transport policies and programmes (TPPs) which they submit annually. These give information primarily about their policies and future programmes. They have, however, also provided information about past expenditure on the progress of individual highway construction programmes, but in a degree of detail which has varied from authority to authority.

With the changes to transport supplementary grant introduced for 1985-86, we shall be seeking more detailed and systematic information about the progress and costs of highway programmes in future TPPs. My Department will be giving authorities guidance on the preparation of TPPs for 1986-87 shortly.

Traffic Statistics

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest available daily flow of motor vehicles, showing heavy goods vehicles as a separate category, on the Colchester bypass section of the A12, the Canterbury bypass section of the A2, the Winchester bypass section of the M3, the Severn Bridge section of the M4 and the Oxford bypass section of the A40.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Average Annual Daily Flow: 1983

	All motor vehicles	Heavy Goods vehicles
Colchester bypass section of the A12	12,000	2,500
Canterbury bypass section of the A2	14,000	2,500
Winchester bypass section of the A33*	40,000	5,700
Severn bridge section of M4	34,000	6,200
Oxford bypass section of the A40	38,000	2,500

* The Winchester bypass section of the M3 as not been built.

Minister's Letter (Costs)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 11, if he will state the estimates sub-head under which the sum of £350 spent on his circular letter of 30 November 1984 was incurred.

Mr. Ridley: All but £7 of the total was spent under Estimates Subhead VI 2 GI(3) — Department of Transport general administrative expenditure. The balance was spent under XIII 22 A3—Stationery and printing supplies to the Houses of Parliament, etc.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any information as to the loss, in volume and sterling value, sustained by British Rail through the miners' dispute to the most recent date available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail estimates that to 9 February 1985 the dispute in the mining industry has reduced its freight receipts by £225 million and rail freight volume by about 70 million tonnes. This is bound to make it more difficult for British Rail to secure the future of its freight business and the jobs in it.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Quotas

4. Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current projected output of liquid milk in relation to quota in 1985.

Mr. Jopling: It is not this Department's policy to issue projections of production.

31. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to bring forward proposals to permit milk producers to have full interchangeability between their retail and wholesale quotas when the necessity arises.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 17 January at columns 498-99.

32. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to ensure that Britain's milk quota is not further reduced in 1986.

Mr. Jopling: National quotas for 1985-86 and for the following three years are set out in the Community regulations on the milk supplementary levy. A Community reserve quantity exists to deal with special difficulties in implementing the quota system: the size of this reserve quantity and allocations from it are subject to annual decision. Although the quotas are set substantially in excess of Community consumption of milk and milk products, no proposals for reduction in the existing national or reserve quantities have been made by the Commission. I would certainly oppose any changes which discriminated against United Kingdom milk producers.

34. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when it is anticipated that the work of the milk tribunals in dealing with appeals for extra quota will be completed.

Mr. Jopling: I anticipate that the work of the England and Wales quota tribunal will be completed next week, apart from a small number of cases which cannot be resolved until later.

Horticulture Industry

15. Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guarantees he is pressing for to safeguard the interests of the United Kingdom horticulture industry on the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government have taken care to safeguard the interests of the United Kingdom horticulture industry throughout the negotiations for the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community, in particular by pressing for an adequate length transitional period.

Food Prices

16. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the effect on consumer prices in the United Kingdom of the price proposals for the common agricultural policy recently made by the Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I estimate that overall the European Commission's recent proposals for 1985-86 farm prices would add about one third of 1 per cent. to retail food prices.

Dairy Farmers

17. Mr. Steen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent it will be possible to ensure that small dairy farmers will be able to produce up to their 1983 level of output.

Mr. Jopling: My intention is that part of the quota bought up under the outgoers scheme will be reallocated so as to restore small producers whose final quota is 200,000 litres or less to their base year level of production. For most of them this will be their 1983 level.

CAP Intervention System

18. Mr. Dykes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will propose to his counterparts in the European Economic Community Council of Agriculture Ministers at their next meeting the introduction of the standard quantities concept for leading food items in the common agricultural policy intervention system.

Mr. MacGregor: In March 1984 the Council of Ministers agreed in principle to introduce guarantee thresholds for all products in or likely to be in surplus or on which expenditure is rising rapidly. Guarantee thresholds are in many ways similar to standard quantities.

Agriculture Industry (Subsidies)

19. Mr. Chope asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures available for public subsidies to agriculture per person employed in agriculture.

Mr. MacGregor: There are problems in the definition of "subsidies", but figures relevant to my hon. Friend's question are given in the 1985 annual review of agriculture White Paper (Cmnd. 9423), in particular, tables 5 and 28.

Agricultural Prices

20. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the European Economic Community Commission's 1985-86 agricultural price proposals.

Mr. Jopling: Since the Commission announced its proposals on 30 January, I have received representations from the farmers' unions in the United Kingdom. I anticipate receiving shortly representations from other interests.

21. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the European Economic Community Commission to make common agricultural policy proposals for the next year.

Mr. Jopling: The European Commission announced its proposals for CAP prices for 1985-86 and related measures on 30 January; the Council of Ministers (Agriculture) is expected to discuss these proposals at its next meeting on 25-26 February.

British Food Products

22. Mr. Baldry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the scope and quality of the marketing and promotion of British food products by British organisations.

Mr. MacGregor: I am never satisfied that we have reached a stage where further progress cannot be made. The Government attach considerable importance to the marketing of our food, and that is why we set up Food From Britain nearly two years ago with the aim of improving our efforts in this area. During that time encouraging progress has been made. The various organisations which operate in specific commodity sectors also devote considerable resources to marketing and promotion.

Sheep Scab

23. Mr. Harvey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken by his Department to prevent the spread of sheep scab.

Mrs. Fenner: Early last year the Ministry, with the full co-operation of the industry and local authorities, intensified the programme to control and eradicate sheep scab. As part of this programme two national dipping periods were applied. Consultations are in progress about the measures to be adopted this year.

Sugar

24. Mrs. McCurley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current level of sugar being used for industrial purposes.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom food processing and chemical industries use approximately 1·4 million tonnes of sugar per year, of which about 25,000 tonnes are used by the chemical industry.

Farming Land (Trusts)

25. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of farming land is owned by trusts.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that no official statistics are available on the ownership of agricultural land.

Farm Capital Grants

26. Mr. Bruce asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the proposed changes in farm capital grants.

Mr. Jopling: By yesterday I had received a letter from the president of the National Farmers Union and correspondence from hon. Members of this House enclosing copies of letters from county branches of the NFU. In addition, 27 other hon. Members have written to me sending copies of letters written by members of the Land Drainage Contractors Association whose chairman and secretary have written to me direct.

Departmental Services (Privatisation)

27. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what current plans he has for privatising services controlled by his Department.

Mr. Jopling: In addition to privatisation that has already taken place, we are currently examining the possibility for the National Seeds Development Organisation. Further, following the Agricultural Holdings Act 1984, responsibility for the appointment of arbitrators under the agricultural holdings legislation will be transferred to the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors in January 1986. I regularly review the Ministry's work to assess other possibilities.

National Diet (Improvement)

28. Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to introduce programmes to alter food production to provide for a healthier national diet.

Mrs. Fenner: It is the aim of the Government to ensure that consumers are provided with sufficient information about foods to enable them to make the appropriate choices within the diet that they wish to follow. We think it is for the food industry to assess consumer demand for various types of products and supply them accordingly.

Dairy Quotas

29. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in the implementation of the new European Economic Community dairy quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Most member states have now made the necessary arrangements to implement the supplementary levy system. However, the Commission has initiated infringement proceedings against Italy for its failure to make the required implementing arrangements. Various problems remain with the application of the measures and the Commission has proposed a number of technical amendments designed to help resolve these. Meanwhile, member states are not collecting the interim payments of supplementary levy due before the end of 1984-85. In the United Kingdom most of the work of the tribunals will be completed by next week. We shall then be able to finalise wholesale producers' secondary quota and calculate the total primary and secondary quota for direct sellers.

30. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the progress of the dairy produce quota scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I am glad to say that the main bulk of the England and Wales quota tribunal's work will be completed next week. We shall then be able to finalise wholesale producers' secondary quota and calculate the total primary and secondary quota for direct sellers.

I am satisfied that we are doing everything possible to operate the rules as flexibly and as helpfully as we can and I believe the system is as fair as it could be, given the need to settle quotas quickly.

We are, of course, aware of the need for changes in some areas, without prejudice to the fundamental principles of the quota scheme. The Commission has now put forward a number of proposals which go some way towards meeting our requirements.

Environment Improvement (Financial Support)

33. Dr. Twinn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that schemes of environmental improvement on farms in the less-favoured areas should receive financial support from his Department.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department already provides assistance through the capital grant schemes to a range of environmentally desirable farm improvements. Moreover, we are pressing for the new EC structures regulation to incorporate wider powers to promote farming practices beneficial to the environment.

Wildlife and Countryside Act

35. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the recommendations in the first report of the Environment Committee on the operation and effectiveness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act as they affect the work of his Department.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government are currently considering the Committee's recommendations and will make their response in due course.

Outgoers Scheme

36. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling: To date invitations have been sent to a total of 3,920 producers. By 8 February, 1,273 producers had decided to go out of production and they will, on a full year basis, surrender a total of 160 million litres. As other producers come to make their decisions, some will no doubt drop out, thereby allowing offers to be made to others. I have no reason to suppose that we will not be able to reach our target of 289 million litres.

Soil Survey

37. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about his announcement on 18 January, Official Report, column 248, on the level of financial support for the Soil Survey of England and Wales.

Mr. Jopling: I have received 25 letters from hon. Members on this subject since my announcement on 18 January.

Drainage

38. Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his Department's current policy on drainage grants.

Mrs. Fenner: My hon. Friend the Minister of State explained my Department's policy on drainage in the debate on 23 January in the Fifth Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments. Briefly, we recognise the importance of field drainage in good land management, which is why we shall continue to grant-aid it. But drainage grants have accounted for almost one third of grants paid under the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme, and over the last five years about £230 million in grant has been paid for field drainage in the United Kingdom. Approximately 60 per cent. of lowland drainage grants in England go to the specialised cereals and general arable sectors.

Caribbean (Ministerial Visit)

39. Mr. Barron asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Parliamentary Secretary's recent visit to banana-producing countries in the Caribbean.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 4 February.

Beef and Sheepmeat

40. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement giving Her Majesty's Government's response to proposals by the European Economic Community Commission to abolish variable beef premiums and restrict support under the sheepmeat regime.

49. Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to support the retention of the variable premium during the farm price negotiations in Brussels.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro).

Farm Incomes

41. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the trend in farmers' real incomes over the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Agricultural income inevitably fluctuates from one year to the next. My main concern is over the imbalance between returns to the relatively prosperous arable sectors and those to some livestock sectors. We will take account of this imbalance during the forthcoming CAP price fixing.

Agricultural Research

42. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present research work carried out at the various agricultural research establishments in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: My Ministry maintains a continuous dialogue with establishments carrying out research on its behalf. One of the purposes of this dialogue is to ensure that the work undertaken is of an acceptable quality. The content of the research programme is also kept under regular scrutiny. Agriculture Ministers will be taking account of the advice of the priorities board in determining how Departments' research resources are to be allocated in future.

Dutch Horticulture Industry

43. Mr. Torney asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding subsidised fuel by Holland to its horticulture industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe).

Beef Cow Herd

44. Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the decline in numbers of the beef cow herd since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: The beef cow herd in the United Kingdom decreased by 192,000 head between June 1979 and June 1984.

Food Products (Contents)

45. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will introduce legislation to extend the range of information required to be displayed by manufacturers on the content of food products.

Mrs. Fenner: The Food Labelling Regulations 1984 which came into operation on 19 September 1984 represents a very substantial improvement in food labelling law. We are, however, considering the recommendation for improved labelling of the fat content of foods which was contained in the report of the committee on medical aspects of food policy on diet and cardiovascular disease. Industry representatives have also discussed with my officials the possibility of full nutrition labelling of foods. We hope to make an announcement shortly.

Winter Wheat

46. Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the intervention price of winter wheat.

Mr. MacGregor: There is no intervention price for winter wheat as such. The current intervention price for feed wheat is £122·59 per tonne.

Fishing Industry

47. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in eliminating national operating aids given to fishing industries in other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. MacGregor: The European Commission has undertaken a comprehensive review of all national aids in the fisheries sector and is instituting action where those aids are considered to be incompatible with Community law.

New Zealand Dairy Produce

48. Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the level of imports into the United Kingdom of New Zealand dairy produce; and if he will make a statement about future levels.

Mr. MacGregor: The trade statistics show that in 1984 the United Kingdom imported from New Zealand 89,749 tonnes of butter, 6,111 tonnes of cheese and 66 tonnes of milk powder. Not all of this will necessarily have entered into free circulation.

For the future the United Kingdom is authorised to import on special terms 81,000 tonnes and 79,000 tonnes of butter from New Zealand in 1985 and 1986 respectively. The quantity of imports in 1987 and 1988 is to be determined by the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers before 1 August of the previous year on the basis of a report and proposal from the Commission. The Council is to decide before 1 August 1988 on the maintenance of the special arrangements after 1 January 1989. In addition, New Zealand may export to the European Economic Community on special terms up to 9,500 tonnes of cheese annually, most of which is expected to come to the United Kingdom.

Hill Farmers (Compensatory Allowances)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1968 the level of compensatory allowances paid to hill farmers for sheep and cattle in terms of current and 1980 prices and the total cost of such allowances to the Exchequer in each of those years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is as follows:

Rates of Compensatory Allowance in the United Kingdom

	Cattle		Higher Rate Sheep		Lower Rate Sheep
Year	Rate of allowance £	1980 price equivalent £	Rate of allowance £	1980 price equivalent £	Rate of allowance £	1980 price equivalent £

Meat (Export Refunds)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the average time which elapsed in 1984 in the payment of advance export refunds on meat under European Economic Community regulation 565/80 between (a) placing of the meat under customs control, (b) receipt of the claim by the intervention board and (c) issue of the payment by the board; and what steps he can take to reduce the length of these periods in respect of Northern Ireland meat exporters.

Mr. MacGregor: The average time taken between entry of the meat into customs control and receipt of the claim by the intervention board could not be ascertained without disproportionate cost. The average time taken from receipt to payment of the claim was four weeks. Management action has been taken by Her Majesty's Customs to clarify instructions and by the board to strengthen the staff engaged on this work.

Dumping at Sea

Mr. Hill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, under proposed new legislation for dumping at sea, the United Kingdom will conform to international conventions on sea dumping; and what powers will exist to enforce such conventions.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. Part II of the Food and Environment Protection Bill contains all the necessary powers to implement the international conventions on dumping at sea, including powers of enforcement.

Mr. Hill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, following his proposed measures for monitoring the dumping of nuclear and toxic waste within United Kingdom territorial waters, he will also include within the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords] provisions to protect marine life from dumping of all types of waste products.

Mr. MacGregor: Such provisions are included in the Bill.

Mr. Hill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provisions exist under European Community law to monitor levels of dumping at sea of waste products, including nuclear and radioactive materials.

Mr. MacGregor: Under the Euratom treaty, member states are required to monitor the level of radioactivity in air, water and soil. There are no provisions in European Community law which require levels of dumping to be monitored.

Food Imports

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much (a) wheat, (b) sugar, (c) butter and (d) cheese was imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is set out in the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423) in tables 8, 11 and 17, a copy of which is in the Library.

Food Manufacture

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much (a) wheat, (b) sugar, (c) butter and (d) cheese was manufactured in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is set out in the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423) in tables 8, 11 and 17, a copy of which is in the Library.

Food Supplies (Warfare)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if there are any plans to bring food supplies into city areas in the event of attack.

Mrs. Fenner: This and other aspects of food control and distribution in wartime are covered in the plans being developed by MAFF and local authorities.

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with (a) the Food Manufacturers Federation and (b) the National Farmers Union about the provision and distribution of food in (a) a conventional phase and (b) a nuclear phase of an attack.

Mrs. Fenner: Consultations on this matter have taken place with representatives of the food trades, including members of the Food Manufacturers Federation. No consultations have yet taken place with the NFU.

Nuclear Blast

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to issue advice to farmers on making grain stores and cattle sheds secure against blast and radiation effects of nuclear weapons.

Mrs. Fenner: Advice to farmers on protection against the effects of radioactive fallout will be given in the revised version of "Home Defence and the Farmer." General information on the effects of nuclear weapons is contained in "Nuclear Weapons" and on protective measures in "Domestic Nuclear Shelters Technical Guidance," both published by the Home Office.

Crops (Cold-resistant Strains)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if there are any plans to produce cold-resistant strains of crops for use after a nuclear attack.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department has no such plans.

Warfare (Food Distribution)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidelines have been issued to commercial food manufacturers and distributors about distributing food in the event of an attack; and whether commercial companies are expected to undertake this task.

Mrs. Fenner: Proposals for food rationing in wartime, which were formulated in consultation with representatives of the food trades, are now being discussed with local authorities. The question of the part to be played by commercial companies and any guidance to be offered on this has yet to be decided.

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with representatives of commercial food suppliers and distributors about distribution of food to the public in an attack.

Mrs. Fenner: Discussions with these interests have taken place as part of the Department's routine civil defence planning for food distribution in crisis and war.

Warfare (Food Stocks)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated time that stocks of (a) wheat, (b) butter and fats, (c) sugar and (d) canned foods would be expected to last in the event of an attack.

Mrs. Fenner: No single estimate can be given in view of the large number of factors involved.

Warfare (Livestock)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if there are any plans to evacuate livestock from likely target areas in the event of (a) nuclear war and (b) conventional war.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department has no such plans.

Solway Firth (Salmon Netting)

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last visited the Solway Firth to review salmon netting practices.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, and I visited the Solway on 26 July 1984 to meet representatives of local fishing interests and to see salmon nets in operation. Following that meeting, discussions have been taking place between representatives of the North-West water authority and the Annan district salmon fishery board, with co-operation from the fisheries departments, to identify solutions to the major problems which have to be overcome to achieve a system of joint management of salmon and freshwater fisheries in the Solway area.

Aircraft Usage

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make available in the Library data covering the overall usage of aircraft in agriculture, horticulture, forestry and other situations since 1979, in the manner in which it was previously published by his Department;

(2) why data on the overall usage of aircraft in agriculture, horticulture, forestry and other situations is no longer published by his Department.

Mrs. Fenner: Data on the aerial application of pesticides in agriculture, horticulture and forestry for the years 1978 to 1981 have been published in the pesticide usage survey report series (reports numbers 22, 28 and 34). A report for 1982 is in preparation.

The collection, for the purpose of the annual review of agriculture, of data on the overall use of aircraft in agriculture and so on was discontinued in 1980 as being of insufficient significance to justify the costs of collection.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a list of all the pesticide usage survey reports published to date; and if he will make available in the Library survey reports Nos. 23. "Review of usage of pesticides in agriculture, horticulture and forestry, England and Wales 1975-79", 29, "Vegetables, 1981" and 35, "Arable farm crops and grass 1982".

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those pesticide products cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme containing methyl isothiocyanate, or liberating methyl isothiocyanate when used.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 12 February 1985, c. 108]: There is one pesticide containing methyl isothiocyanate which is cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme, but I understand it is no longer marketed in this country. There are two active ingredients included in products cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme which liberate methyl isothiocyonate on use. These are metham sodium and dazomet. The products concerned are used for soil fumigation and are as follows:

Basamid
Basamid liquid
Campbell's metham sodium
Sistam
Super sistam
Vipam
Vitafume
Vond Metam
Boszamet minicrystals
Midox dazomet crystals
Salvo

Departmental Vote (Cash Limits)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is proposed to change the cash limit on any Department Vote for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Jopling: Yes. Following underspending on a number of services, the cash limit for Class III, Vote 4 (Other Agricultural and Food Services and Support for the Fishing Industry) is being reduced by £7 million from £149,134,000 to £142,134,000. This reduction will partly offset increased expenditure, subject to parliamentary approval, of £23,300,000 on Class III, Vote 3 (Agricultural Support, Animal Health, Land Drainage and Flood Protection) which is not subject to a cash limit and for which a supplementary estimate will be presented to Parliament shortly.

Seal Population (North Sea)

Mr. John Townend asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has of the seal population in the North sea; what information he has as to the gross food requirement of the seal population there; and what information he has as to the amount of fish destroyed but not consumed by the seals.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 295]: The Natural Environment Research Council provides regular advice on the management of seal populations, including annual estimates of the population.

There are five population centres for grey seals in the United Kingdom: the Farne Islands, Outer Hebrides and Orkney, Inner Hebrides, and South-West Britain. Only the Farne Islands population can really be considered to be in the North sea, and NERC's population estimate for that area is 8,010.

For common seals there are six population centres: Inner Hebrides, Outer Hebrides, Orkney, Shetland, east coast Scotland and the Wash. The figures for the two relevant areas—east coast Scotland and the Wash—are 850 to 1,050 and 6,600 respectively. The approximate total of all seals in the North sea is therefore 15,500.

In January 1984, NERC's sea mammal reseach unit produced a report for the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland on the interactions between grey seals and United Kingdom fisheries. The report covers grey seals only, and we have no comparable information about common seals. The report estimates the maximum annual consumption of fish by grey seals in the Farne Islands at 15,930 tonnes.

As regards fish damaged but not eaten, the report analyses damage to the salmon population at certain specific sites, but it does not attempt to give overall estimates for the North sea or for all fish species. I understand from NERC that it would be practically impossible to produce such figures.

A copy of NERC's report is available in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prescriptions

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the total cost of prescriptions given on the National Health Service in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years;

(2) how many prescriptions were given to patients on the National Health Service in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The numbers of prescriptions issued by general practitioners, including those dispensed directly by dispensing doctors, and the gross cost of prescriptions in each of the years from 1979 to 1983 were as follows:

Year	Number thousands	Gross cost £ thousands
1979	12,933	33,692
1980	13,038	41,940
1981	13,051	49,007
1982	13,435	56,982
1983	13,984	63,665

Gross cost includes charges payable by patients. Figures are not available for the cost of individual patient prescribing in hospitals.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated saving to the National Health Service in Northern Ireland through the proposed limitation of the kind of drugs which can be obtained through National Health Service prescriptions.

Mr. Chris Patten: An estimate cannot be made until the content of the limited list has been finalised.

Short Brothers, Belfast

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many workers are presently employed by Short Bros., Belfast; and how this figure compares with the previous five years.

Dr. Boyson: At 31 January 1985 Shorts employed 6,632 persons. The average number of persons employed by the company in the last five years is as follows:

	Number
Year ended 31 March 1984	6,127
19 months ended 31 March 1983	6,265
Year ended 31 August 1981	7,096
Year ended 31 August 1980	6,629
Year ended 31 August 1979	6,648

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the level of the profit or loss achieved by Short Bros., Belfast, in each of the last five years; and what are the projections for each of the next two years.

Dr. Boyson: The latest published accounts of Short Brothers plc are for the year ended 31 March 1984. These show the following losses for the five accounting periods to that date:

Year ended 31 March 1984	2,371
19 months ended 31 March 1983	19,099
Year ended 31 August 1981	12,951
Year ended 31 August 1980	8,919
Year ended 31 August 1979	8,260

The projected profits/losses for the next two financial years are commercially sensitive, and it would not be in the company's interests to reveal them at this time.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been given to Short Bros., Belfast, in aid and deficit support over each of the last five years.

Dr. Boyson: In the financial years ending 31 March 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, Short Brothers received £9·8 million, £16·3 million, £9·0 million and £9·5 million, respectively. These amount represent Government assistance from all sources in Northern Ireland, together with assistance provided under schemes operated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

On 13 December 1984, at column 595, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced his intention to make £6·5 million available to the company in the current financial year. This assistance will be payable under the Aircraft and Shipbuilding industries Order (Northern Ireland) 1979. Shorts may also benefit in the current financial year from other schemes operated by the Department of Economic Development and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Industrial Development

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many industrial national inquiries have been directed to (a) his Department and (b) the Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board during the last month for which statistics are available.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Member's question has been interpreted as referring to inquiries from outside Northern Ireland about possible industrial investment in the Province. All such inquiries are referred to the Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland. The IDB received 18 firm inquiries from companies outside Northern Ireland during January 1985.

Capital Grants

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the uptake of capital grants for local enterprise development unit-sized companies; and if he will make it his policy to maintain the present levels of such grants for such companies.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Dental Undergraduates

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new dental undergraduates were admitted for dental education in Northern Ireland in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Scott: Thirty-five each year.

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners in 1984 were remanded in custody prior to trial for periods between (a) nought to three months, (b) three to six months, (c) six to nine months, (d) nine to 12 months, (e) 12 to 18 months and (f) over 18 months for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 871]: Of those persons in custody at the time of their trial and tried on indictment, the numbers remanded in custody for the specified periods in 1984 were as follows:

	Persons charged with:
Interval between first remand and termination	Scheduled offences	Non-scheduled offences
Less than 3 months	27	45
3-6 months	22	26
6-9 months	55	15
9-12 months	59	9
12-18 months	34	5
18 months and over	47	1
Total	244	101

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

No-passport Excursions

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any further talks have been held, or will be held, with the French authorities to discuss the possible reinstatement of the no-passport excursion scheme.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister explained to President Mitterrand in October 1984 the problems caused by the termination of the former no-passport excursion arrangement and its replacement by the more complex scheme now in force. My right hon. and learned Friend then raised the matter with Monsieur Cheysson in Paris in November. It has been agreed that the present scheme should be reviewed jointly with the French authorities in the early part of this year. In preparation for this review my officials are in contact with the General Council of British Shipping, and with the Home Office and Post Office, to prepare material for an evaluation of the first six months' operation of the scheme.

Embassy Staffs

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will give details of any changes in the numbers of diplomatic or administrative and technical staff at Her Majesty's embassies in Damascus, Baghdad or Teheran since the reply to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton on 6 June 1984.

Mr. Renton: Since the answer given to my hon. Friend by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) on 6 June 1984 there have been no changes in the numbers of diplomatic or administrative and technical staff at Her Majesty's embassies in Damascus and Baghdad. There are two more third secretaries in the British interests section of the Sweden embassy in Tehran than were listed previously. One of these has been added since, but the other, was omitted in error from the earlier reply.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current number of administrative and technical staff currently employed at the embassies of Syria, Iraq and Iran, respectively.

Mr. Luce: The number of administrative and technical staff currently employed at these missions is as follows:

	Number
Syria	3
Iraq	27
Iran	8

Diplomats

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list by name and diplomatic title or job description all persons with diplomatic status currently accredited to the United Kingdom in the Syrian, Iraqi and Iranian embassies, respectively.

Mr. Luce: This information is contained in the London Diplomatic List of December 1984, a copy of which is held by the Library of the House. The following changes have taken place since the list went to press:

SYRIA
No changes
IRAQ
Departures
Dr. Sabah Abdullah Sultan, Medical Counsellor
Arrivals
Mr. Tarik Abdulwahab Abdulrazzak, Attache
IRAN
No changes.

Iranian Consulate General, Manchester

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Iranian citizens are currently employed in the consulate general of the Islamic Republic of Iran in Manchester.

Mr. Luce: Thirteen, of which four are notified to us as consular staff and nine are locally engaged.

Helsinki Final Act

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the implementation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Eastern European countries of the provisions of the Helsinki final act during the last six months.

Mr. Rifkind: During the six month period to 31 December 1984, implementation by the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries of their commitments under the Helsinki final act showed little significant change. There were a few positive developments in individual countries, but generally, and in the Soviet Union in particular, the situation remained unsatisfactory. Emigration from the Soviet Union dropped to its lowest level since the signing of the Final Act. There were however welcome developments on a small number of personal and family reunification cases, where individuals were granted exit visas to leave the Soviet Union.

SECURITY IN EUROPE PRINCIPLES GUIDING RELATIONS BETWEEN PARTICIPATING STATES CONFIDENCE BUILDING MEASURES AND CERTAIN ASPECTS OF SECURITY AND DISARMAMENT (BASKET I)

The Soviet performance in the field of human rights remained poor throughout the period under review. Acts in violation of principle VII concerned with 'Respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief' were regularly reported, with much attention focussed on various forms of religious persecution, particularly of members of unregistered sects. An orthodox believer, Vladimir Poresh, was given an additional sentence of three years' hard labour at the end of 1984. He was apparently the first sentenced prisoner of conscience to be tried under repressive new (1983) legislation punishing those who "maliciously disobeyed" the penal authorities.

A higher level of officially inspired anti-semitic propaganda was matched by a marked increase in the number of Jewish activists tried and sentenced for a variety of alleged criminal offences. Human rights monitors, other religious groups and peace activists were also subject to continuing pressures, which in a number of cases led to arrest and imprisonment. There were reports that some of the accused sustained physical injuries whilst awaiting trial. There was also further evidence of psychiatric abuse.

Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union declined further, only 175 people being permitted to emigrate in the last quarter of 1984. The total number of Jews to transit Vienna in 1984 was only 900 — the lowest figure since large-scale emigration began in 1970. Soviet spokesmen have suggested that this is because the process of family reunification is virtually complete.

The Soviet authorities gave no indication of any change in their harsh approach even towards the better known individual cases. Mrs. Elena Bonner, wife of Academician Andrei Sakharov, who had been arrested in May, was convicted on 17 August of anti-Soviet slander and sentenced to five years' internal exile. Both Dr. Sakharov and Mrs. Bonner are reportedly living in exile in Gorky. Various attempts were made by the Soviet authorities, for example, by the provision of film and photographs, to suggest that the couple were alive and well, although their relatives and friends continued to be unable to contact them. Bulgarian compliance with the Helsinki and Madrid provisions showed little change. Pressure on dissidents was maintained and in general implementation of CSCE provisions of human rights gave cause for concern.

In Czechoslovakia, too, there was little change. CSCE implementation remained fundamentally flawed. Basic freedoms continued to be withheld notably through use of "protective supervision" legislation against dissidents. The attitude of Czechoslovak authorities on the question of family reunification, family visits, bi-national marriages and tourism continued to be severely restrictive.

GDR policy on implementation remained essentially unchanged. About 10,000 people were allowed to leave in the period under review, only one third of the total for the first six months of 1984, but nevertheless more than in previous years. Hungarian compliance with the Helsinki and Madrid provisions on the other hand was relatively satisfactory. During the reporting period, there was no major harrassment of dissidents.

In Poland strong pressures were maintained on opposition activists. But under the July amnesty virtually all political prisoners were released. Father Popieluszko's murder drew widespread condemnation. Four secret police officers were put on trial for the crime and have now been sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

In Romania, Father Gheorghe Calciu-Rumireasa, a Romanian Orthodox priest, who had been imprisoned for trade union activities, was released from prison in August 1984 but is still effectively under house arrest. In general, Romania continued to pay scant regard to the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki and Madrid documents during the period under review.

CONFIDENCE AND SECURITY BUILDING MEASURES

Only one major exercise, "Shield 84" held in Czechoslovakia in September, was notified. Details contained in the notification were sparse and no observers were invited.

CO-OPERATION IN THE FIELD OF ECONOMICS, OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY AND OF THE ENVIRONMENT (BASKET II)

A marginal improvement in East-West trading relations during the period under review was noticeable, in part attributable to a slight upturn in the economies of Eastern European countries, in part to an improvement in political relations. In general, the procedures for conducting business in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe have remained unchanged and the flow of economic and commerical information limited. There has been some improvement in direct-dial telephone facilities for business men in Moscow.

CO-OPERATION IN HUMANITARIAN AND OTHER FIELDS (BASKET III)

Emigration from Eastern European countries has continued at a generally low level though there has been a slight increase in the numbers permitted to leave Romania and Poland. As noted above the increased rate of emigration from the GDR at the beginning of the year has not been maintained though the numbers leaving are still greater than in previous years. The GDR authorities took an intransigent line over asylum seekers in the Prague embassy of the Federal Republic of Germany. Emigration from the Soviet Union fell to a new low level. With the exception of Poland and Hungary, the Eastern European countries continued to place restrictions in the way of family visits and reunifications.

Compliance with the information provisions of the Helsinki and Madrid documents by the countries of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe remained generally poor. Jamming of foreign radio transmissions continued except in Hungary and Romania. Existing restrictions on the media and the activities of journalists remained generally unchanged.

CO-OPERATION AND EXCHANGES IN THE FIELD OF CULTURE AND EDUCATION

Although political factors and internal restraints have had their effect on cultural and educational exchanges during the period under review and the improvement in the East-West political climate should permit some increase of exchanges in coming years.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

EC (Departmental Officials)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many officials, and at what grade and salary, within his Department have responsibility for dealing with all aspects of the European Community.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Home Helps

Mr. Saeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to the average cost per annum of providing a home help;

(2) what study he has made of the correlation between increased levels of provision of home help services and the additional numbers of elderly or infirm people who could continue to live in their own homes or in a warden-controlled environment instead of being admitted to hospital or full-time residential care; what estimate he has made of the relative cost implications involved; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what study he has made of the correlation between increased levels of provision of home help services and the additional average length of time which elderly or infirm people could continue to live in their own homes prior to requiring full-time residential or nursing care; what is the current average cost per week of providing full-time residential or nursing care to an elderly or infirm person; what is the average current cost per week of providing home help assistance to an elderly or infirm person; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: A number of recent research projects sponsored by the Department have examined the relationship between residential and community care for the elderly. In particular a study in Coventry from 1975 to 1978 sponsored jointly by the Department, the Joseph Rowntree memorial trust and Coventry city council made some useful estimates of the specific correlation referred to in the questions for the 65 clients of the home help services in the sample and the cost implications. These have to be treated with caution and cannot be reliably projected on to a national scale owing to the small size of the sample and the fact that home help is only one of a range of services required to enable elderly or infirm people to continue living in their own homes. A recent report by the Audit Commission has examined the operation of the home help services in the context of other services for the elderly.

Information about average costs of certain local authority services is in the annual publications of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy entitled "Personal Social Services Statistics". Their latest report covering expenditure for 1982-83, although not based on a complete coverage, shows that the average hourly cost of home help service in England and Wales was £2·97, but as the number of hours provided for clients varies according to their needs it is not possible to make a valid comparison with the £90·59 a week of full time care in a local authority residential home for the elderly in England and Wales.

The average contribution under the supplementary benefit scheme for the support of elderly or infirm persons in private residential homes and nursing homes was £75·80 a week in 1983.

Young Persons (Training Schemes)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make a statement on the progress made by the committee chaired by him which is looking into the question of benefits and grants for young people who are on training schemes, in apprenticeships, in full-time education or unemployed, between the ages of 16 and 21 years.

Mr. Whitney: These issues are still under consideration. We hope to announce the outcome of the social security review in the course of the next few months.

Housing Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the current price cost in 1983-84 of administering housing benefit; and what was the average cost of administration per claimant.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated cost of administering housing benefit in 1983-84 was £103 million. I regret that the average cost of administration per claimant is not available.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of households which qualify for housing benefit; and what percentage of all households this figure represents.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Subsidy returns indicate that about 7½ million households currently recieve housing benefit. This represents broadly 35 per cent. of households in Great Britain.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what was the total number of supplementary benefit appeals registered during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Whitney: During the four weeks ending 15 January 1985 20 supplementary benefit appeals were registered by the two local offices (Workington and Carlisle), whose boundaries include the Workington travel-to-work area.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what was the total number of unemployed people claiming supplementary benefit during the last month for which statistics are available and the figures for the comparable month in 1983.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of unemployed people receiving supplementary benefit from the two local offices whose boundaries include the Workington travel-to-work area in December 1984 and December 1983 are as follows:

	December 1984	December 1983
Workington	2,530	2,675
Carlisle	3,315	3,161

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what was the total number of supplementary benefit claimants for the last month for which statistics are available and the figures for the comparable month in 1983.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit from the two offices whose boundaries include the Workington travel-to-work area in December 1984 and December 1983 are as follows:

	December 1984	December 1983
Workington	6,398	6,258
Carlisle	8,293	8,122

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will amend the relevant statutory provisions to allow young people to continue to receive supplementary benefit whilst participating in international youth exchanges.

Mr. Newton: Under regulation 3 of the Supplementary Benefit (Conditions of Entitlement) Regulations a person who is required to be available for employment as a condition for receipt of benefit cannot receive supplementary benefit for any period spent abroad. This is because unemployed people are expected to make themselves readily available to take any suitable job, or attend promptly any interview about employment and people abroad cannot properly satisfy this condition. We have no plans to change the regulations.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether every product in the proposed limited list will appear in the drug tariff.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in the light of limited list proposals, whether he has any intention to make changes to the dental practitioners' formulary list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Consultations are still taking place on the limited list proposals. Subject to the outcome of these consultations, some amendment may be required to the Secretary of State's list for dental prescribing which is appended to the Dental Practitioners' Formulary.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether in the light of all the considered representations he has received, he will now consider a mechanism similar to that appertaining for hospital formularies whereby a doctor can prescribe a product not on the limited list where in his judgment it is imperative for the patient.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are considering the arguments which have been put forward for such a mechanism.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what contact he or any other Minister or official of his Department had with Health Action International and Social Audit in formulating his proposals for the limited list of prescription medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why letters to his Department complaining about limited list prescribing proposals have been answered by standard responses, with only minor variations in opening and closing paragraphs, which do not cover the issues raised by individual writers; when the standard response letter was composed; why his Department has continued to use the same basic text for at least six weeks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received nearly 7,000 letters about the limited list proposals announced on 8 November. In order to answer these letters as promptly as possible, we prepared standard replies covering the main points at issue. We are endeavouring to adapt these replies as necessary to answer any particular points raised and to use them only when they are appropriate. However we do not have sufficient Ministers and senior officials concerned with this policy to engage in a detailed correspondence with every correspondent and I regret that some apparent discourtesy is unavoidable.

All the letters we receive are being read with care and the points being made are being noted by Ministers and the Chief Medical Officer. The basic text of our letter will change when we make our final decision in the light of all the representations we have received.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to publish the final version of the restricted list of drugs to be made available on the National Health Service from 1 April; and how it differs from the provisional list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We intend to make a comprehensive announcement shortly.

Prescriptions Charges and Drug Costs

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he proposes to take any action to deal with the wide variation in prices charged by pharmacists for dispensing identical private prescriptions;

(2) what is the average chemist's mark-up on drugs compared with the wholesale price.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Although I understand that Pharmaceutical Services of Great Britain publishes a list of recommended fees for private dispensing, the prices, including any mark-up on ingredient cost, charged for dispensing a private prescription are a matter for the dispensing pharmacist. They are not a matter for Government.

There is no mark-up on drugs dispensed against National Health Service prescriptions. Retail pharmacists are reimbursed the cost of drugs dispensed and receive in addition remuneration, which for 1984 averaged £1·02 per item dispensed. Our reimbursement levels also take account of the level of discounts which are frequently offered by wholesalers to pharmacists.

Elderly People (Health Provision)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those regional health authorities which have taken the provision of private nursing home beds into consideration when making provision in their region for the increase in the number of elderly people and the allowance they have made for private nursing home beds in their current regional strategy papers.

Mr. John Patten: The information is not available centrally. Our guidance to health authorities asks them to take voluntary and private provision into account in their strategic planning.

Geriatric Beds

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each district health authority the increase in the number of long-term geriatric beds in National Health Service hospitals and provide the figures for the increase in the elderly population for each district health authority for each year since 1974.

Mr. John Patten: Information available centrally on available beds in the specialty of geriatric medicine does not distinguish between those for acute care and those for long-term care. A reply based on all geriatric beds could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Elderly People (Private Nursing Homes)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the figures for the total number of people over pensionable age who have moved from long-term geriatric care in National Health Service hospitals to the private nursing home sector in each of the years since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not collected centrally.

Birmingham General Hospital

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many operations have been carried out at Birmingham general hospital upon patients who do not live in the Birmingham area during each of the last five years; and if he is satisfied that National Health Service resources are being prudently and properly used there.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to seek information from the chairman of Central Birmingham health authority. It is normal and proper for health authorities to use resources for treatment of patients from outside their districts.

AIDS

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if his Department will issue urgent guidelines to all National Health Service staff involved in treating patients suffering from or suspected to be suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations his Department has received concerning guidance to National Health Service workers in contact with patients suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what liaison there is between his Department and international research agencies dealing with the problems of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Research in the United Kingdom into the problems of AIDS is co-ordinated by the Medical Research Council working party on AIDS, on which our Department is represented. The working party collaborates with scientists in other countries through the United States centres for disease control in Atlanta and the World Health Organisation's AIDS reference centre in Paris. In the European Community the Comité pour la Recherche Medicale has set up a working group on AIDS on which the United Kingdom is represented by two members of the MRC working party, who keep our Department closely informed.

Heating Allowances

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received about the level of heating allowances since he first announced that the available scale margin would be applied to them; how many have been favourable to his policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Since 18 June 1984 when my right hon. Friend announced the changes made to the available scale margin in November 1984 at columns 20-22 we have received about 1,350 letters about the changes, including about 770 from hon. and right hon. Members. People do not generally feel any need to write supporting particular Government policies and therefore almost all the letters received commented or enclosed constituents' letters commenting unfavourably on the effects of the changes. However, for the reasons set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) on 27 November 1984 at column 468, we remain convinced that the changes were justified.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the waiting times for appointments for operations in the various health authority areas; if it is his intention to hold an investigation into the problem; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have received some representations from hon. Members and from the public about the length of waiting time for admission for in-patient treatment in individual specialties in particular places. On a national basis, progress is being made in reducing waiting lists. There has been a continuing downward trend, following the disruption caused by the 1982 industrial action. In March 1979 total waiting lists stood at 752,422; by March 1984 they had been reduced to 692,945.

Supplementary Benefit Appeals

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the number of supplementary benefit appeals which were held in Glasgow in each of the last five years for which figures are available, (b) the proportion of the appeals in each year in which the claimants were successful, (c) the proportion of the appeals in each year in which the claimants were represented and (d) the proportion of successful appeals in each year in which the claimants were represented.

Mr. Whitney: It is not our practice to give figures for successful appeals which can be related to individual tribunals. I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible with the information requested on the number of appeals and the frequency of represented appeals.

New Cross Hospital, Wolverhampton

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the proposed date for the construction of the new accident department at New Cross hospital, Wolverhampton.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that the West Midlands regional health authority's present plans, which are to be kept under review, envisage a start in 1992 on a £10 million development to improve facilities for accident and emergency, acute and paediatric services.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in considering the qualifications under which severe weather payments are made; if he intends to announce revised regulations to take account of the position in Scottish areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 11 February, at column 76.

Dental Undergraduates

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he implemented the recommendations to reduce the intake of dental undergraduates in 1984; and what means he used to secure that reduction;

(2) how many new dental undergraduates were admitted for dental education in England and Wales in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for 1983-84 for each region the figures for payments to outside contractors for support services and for contractual arrangements for patient care indicating the services provided; and if he will also give each figure as a percentage of the total expenditure on the relevant service in each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 330]: The table has been derived from the annual accounts of regional and district health authorities for 1983-84. The accounts do not give a detailed analysis of expenditure on contractual arrangements for patient care.

Notes to the table:

1. All figures are for current expenditure: capital is excluded.
2. For contractual arrangements for patient care, "total expenditure on the relevant service" is taken as total current expenditure on hospital services.
3. Payments to doctors, pharmacists, dentists, opticians and others contracted to the NHS to provide family practitioner services are excluded.
4. Minimal expenditure and percentages (ie less than £500 or 0·01 per cent.) are indicated by the use of a dash (—).
5. Information in the table has been prepared on as consistent a basis as practicable but comparisons of percentages between services may in some cases be misleading as the bases of the total relevant expenditure figures for different services are not completely uniform.

ENVIRONMENT

United Nations Decade for Women

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make funds available to local authorities to publicise the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Local authorities have had nine years to publicise the United Nations Decade for Women 1976-85, had they wished to do so.

Home Improvements

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what grants were made to Ealing borough council for (a) home improvement purposes and

(b) council house improvements and maintenance in 1974 and each subsequent year up to the latest year for which figures are available; what is the projection for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Exchequer contributions towards expenditure on home improvement grants paid to Ealing boroughcouncil from 1978-79 onwards were:

Figures in £000's

	£ million
1978-79	242·4
1979-80	299·2
1980-81	359·7
1981-82	487·4
1982-83*	819·0
1983-84*	1,314·0
1984-85*	1,878·0

* Subject to adjustment when audited final claims are received.

Figures in respect of earlier years are not readily available to the Department. The amount which will be paid for 1985-86 will depend in part on their continuing entitlement to contribution on loan charges already incurred but also on the level of expenditure on grants in 1985-86, which is for Ealing to decide within the resources available to them.

Council house improvement and maintenance are not specifically grant-aided through the housing subsidy system. These costs are taken into account in the calculation of an authority's entitlement to housing subsidies. But the size of the Exchequer subsidy depends each year on the entire subsidy calculation, which takes account not only of the total reckonable expenditure incurred by the authority in the provision of council housing, but also the extent to which the authority could reasonably be expected to meet all or part of these costs from local resources.

Insulation Grants

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reinstate for the coming year an allocation to the North Devon district council of £54,000 for home insultation grants; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The allocation of £39,000 to North Devon district council for grants under the homes insulation scheme in 1985-86 is an initial allocation. In common with other authorities in England, they can bid for additional allocations from the substantial reserve of £7 million which we have established, provided there is sufficient demand for grants in their area. This arrangement should ensure that the available funds go where they are most needed.

Local Authority Services (Competition)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is now able to publish his proposals on competition in the provision of local authority services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: With my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales I have today published a consultation paper setting out proposals for promoting increased value for money by exposing more local authority activities to the test of competition. Copies of the paper have been placed in the Library.

By virtue of Part III of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 local authority directly employed staff are already obliged to compete for most of their building and maintenance work and authorities are required to draw up separate annual reports and accounts showing the results of their direct labour organisations performance of such work.

The consultation paper makes two main proposals. First, it proposes that a similar compulsory tendering regime should be extended to the following activities:

i. Refuse collection and street cleansing;
ii. The cleaning of buildings;
iii. Catering services;
iv. Ground maintenance;
v. Vehicle maintenance.

Second, there is a wider range of local government activities where there is scope for securing the benefits of a more competitive approach but where formal statutory tendering regime on DLO lines cannot easily be applied. Therefore, in order to compare the value for money from using directly-employed staff with that of going to outside firms, the paper outlines proposals which would enable the Secretary of State to require authorities to prepare and make public reports comparing in-house costs of particular activities with the costs of having the work done outside.

The paper contains two further proposals. The first is to nullify the imposition by local authorities of contract conditions which have nothing to do with the contractors' competence to carry out the work in question (for instance a condition disqualifying contractors who have worked on certain NATO defence contracts). The second is to give to the Secretary of State power to act where local authorities unjustifiably set aside or frustrate the objective of fair competition. This will make the DLO rules more effective and enforceable.

The proposals in the paper will make a major contribution to the extension of the principles of fair competition in the provision of public services and so enable councils to get better value for money to the benefit of their communities.

Haringey Borough Council (Expenditure)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in calculating the allowable level of 1985-86 expenditure for Haringey borough council, what was the percentage reduction made by his Department from the amount Haringey budgeted to use from internal funds in framing its 1984-85 budget.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Rate Limits

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in setting the 1985-86 rate limits, what is the percentage being reduced from the 1985-86 expenditure level of those authorities who did not seek re-determination.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has no statutory power to alter an expenditure level in the absence of an application for a re-determination.

DEFENCE

Defence Equipment (Sri Lanka)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a general statement on trade in defence equipment and services with Sri Lanka.

Mr. Butler: It has been the consistent policy of this and previous administrations not to disclose details of defence sales business with other countries. However, in accordance with the Government's policy, all such business is considered carefully on its merits on a case by case basis, bearing in mind all relevant factors including the stability of the region. I can give an assurance that this is the case with Sri Lanka at the present time; full account is, of course, being taken of the local situation, which we are monitoring closely.

Nutrition

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what policies and guidelines are issued to the armed forces in respect of nutrition.

Mr. Lee: The nutrition of the armed forces is kept under continuous review by the services nutrition advisory panel whose advice is almost always implemented. The services fitness training programme, including special films and publications incorporating advice on nutrition, strongly reinforces the general advice given to service men in this area, particularly on the ill effects of obesity.

Heart Disease

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the incidence of death from heart disease among the armed forces; and how this compares with the figures for the United Kingdom population as a whole.

Mr. Lee: During the period 1981-83 inclusive there were 130 male deaths from ischaemic heart disease in the regular armed forces in the age group 20-54, a rate of 17 per 100,000 at risk. In the same period in the comparable population of the United Kingdom there were 29,149 deaths from the same cause, a rate of 76 per 100,000 at risk.

Illegal Radio Stations

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any of Her Majesty's naval vessels have taken any action, or if it is proposed that they take any action, in respect of radio stations operating illegally in British territorial waters in interference with stations operating legally from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which he received from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade on 7 February at column 665.

Forces (Entertainment)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the British agencies which book acts for performance before British and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Lee: Entertainment paid for by the Ministry of Defence for the United Kingdom armed forces is provided solely by the combined services entertainment division of the Services Sound and Vision Corporation. I have no information about bookings made for and funded by other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces, or those arranged privately.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence which British agency booked the South African group The C & G Band to play before North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Lee: The Services Sound and Vision Corporation has no record of engaging this band. I have no information about bookings made for and funded by other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces, or those arranged privately.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the arrangements by which performers are recruited to play before British and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Lee: No. Arrangements made by other NATO countries are a matter for their Governments.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will ensure that the South African group The C & G Band does not perform before British forces in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation;

(2) if he will ensure that South African performers are not recruited to play before British and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Lee: The Services Sound and Vision Corporation's practice is to engage United Kingdom entertainers who are members of the appropriate United Kingdom union, and I see no reason for them to change this policy. Arrangements made by other NATO member countries are a matter for their Governments.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to promote the contracting of British entertainers to perform before British and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Lee: The Services Sound and Vision Corporation will continue to engage British entertainers wherever possible. I am happy to say that they have been well received and their work much appreciated in such widely separated and arduous duty stations as Northern Ireland and the Falklands.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military and civilian personnel are engaged in training the Sri Lankan armed forces; how many are loan service personnel; and how many there are from each service.

Mr. Lee: There are no British loan service personnel training the Sri Lankan armed forces. Places are made available on British forces training courses to small numbers of Sri Lankan personnel on an opportunity basis, but no British personnel are specifically dedicated to training Sri Lankan students.

MCV80 (Subcontractors)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the subcontracting arrangements being used by the prime contractors for the MCV80 and MCV80 variants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Subcontract arrangements in all current and planned MCV80 contracts reflect our aim to secure competition at this level, as well as at the main contractor level. Contracts for development of variant vehicles—the major development area remaining — require the prime contractor to select subcontractors on the basis of competitive tendering wherever this is practical. Similarly firms tendering for production contracts are required to maximise competitive subcontracting. Where exceptions are permitted in the interests of safeguarding the programme these are kept under rigorous control.

Trident

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated cost of the Trident programme as a percentage of the overall defence procurement budget.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced a revised cost estimate for the Trident programme on 29 January 1985 at columns 134-7. This will represent on average about 6 per cent. of the defence equipment budget over the period of Trident's procurement.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals have been put forward by any of the nuclear weapons powers for ensuring the maintenance of their nuclear weapons capabilities, currently achieved by periodic underground testing in the context of negotiations for a comprehensive test ban treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I am not aware of any such proposals.

HMS Conqueror (Log)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with inquiries to discover the whereabouts of the contol room log of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Stanley: The police side of these inquiries is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. As far as the Ministry of Defence side is concerned, I cannot at present add to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) on 30 November 1984 at columns 593-94.

Eastern Bloc Countries (Imports)

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the total value of vehicle mechanical parts bought by or on behalf of his Department from Eastern bloc countries between 1980 and 1984;

(2) what was the total value of protective clothing bought by or on behalf of his Department from Eastern bloc countries between 1980 and 1984;

(3) what was the total value of electrical components bought by or on behalf of his Department from Eastern bloc countries between 1980 and 1984;

(4) what was the total value of vehicle tyres bought by or on behalf of his Department from Eastern bloc countries between 1980 and 1984.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry of Defence has no contracts for these items with Eastern bloc countries. However, as I said in my earlier reply to the hon. Member on 11 February 1985, at column 51, some limited purchases of materials and parts may occur at the component level from time to time, but only in circumstances where no problems of strategic dependence are involved.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing revenue obtained from income tax in each year since 1978-79, at current and at constant 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Moore: The information is shown below.

	£ million
Income tax receipts	At current prices	*At 1978-79 prices
1978-79	18,748	18,748
1979-80	20,599	17,620
1980-81	24,295	17,520
1981-82	28,725	18,840
1982-83	30,474	18,740
1983-84	31,280	18,420

*Using the GDP deflator.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cumulative effect on revenue accruing to the Exchequer of changes in (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (d) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate introduced since June 1979.

Mr. Moore: [pursuant to his reply, 7 February 1985, c. 673]: Estimates are shown in the table, taking the base for each of the taxes in 1984-85 as given.

The estimates for income tax are based on the difference in liability in a full year at 1984-85 income levels if 1978-79 allowances, rates and thresholds (after indexation to 1984-85 levels by reference to the statutory formula) were substituted for those currently in force.

Similarly, the figure for capital transfer tax represents the estimated effect on the tax payable on transfers in 1984-85 if the 1978-79 structure of the tax were substituted, with statutory indexation of the rate bands after 1982-83.

The figure for capital gains tax also represents the estimated effect on the tax payable on capital gains realised by individuals and trusts in 1984-85 of substituting the 1978-79 tax regime, but excluding the effect of statutory indexation of the threshold after 1982-83. It includes the effect of the indexation of costs of acquisition. These effects cannot be estimated precisely and are subject to a wide margin of error.

It is not possible to determine what income in 1984-85 would have been if the 1978-79 allowances, rates and thresholds had been in force (after indexation) over all the intervening years, or to what extent the changes in the taxes may have affected the levels of transfers or disposals of capital.

Direct Revenue Effects

	£ million
Total income tax		4,300
of which: Investment Income Surcharge (IIS)	730
Rates and thresholds above the basic rate (excluding (IIS)	1,120
Capital transfer tax		350
Capital gains tax		300

Customs and Excise (Manning Levels)

Mr. Hill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimated projections have been made of future manning levels of Customs and Excise staff at ports of entry to the United Kingdom; and what will be the anticpated effect on such figures of the increases in known heroin smuggling.

Mr. Hayhoe: The planned levels of the total number of permanent staff in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are shown below for 31 March in each year:

	Number
1985	25,500
1986	25,445
1987	25,245
1988	25,020

The investigation and prevention of drugs smuggling attracts the highest priority; manning levels at ports and airports will depend on the identification of high-risk areas and the growth of passenger and freight traffic.

The Government have already made clear their determination to deal with drugs abuse and, in particular, the problems caused by the illicit importation of heroin. In October last year, the Government announced that, in 1985-86, Customs preventive controls were to be increased by 100 new preventive posts and by making 60 temporary posts permanent.

Inland Revenue (Taxation Cases)

Mr. Evennett asked the Chancellor of the Exhequer whether he intends to review the criteria by which the Inland Revenue decides whether to brief counsel to plead taxation cases on its behalf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Cases in which the Revenue are concerned before Appeal Commissioners and other tribunals cover a very wide range. Decisions on which cases require the use of counsel depend on a variety of factors and are properly a matter for the Board of Inland Revenue and its legal advisers.

Income Tax

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for each 1 per cent. increase in income tax personal allowances, what is the total gain to income tax payers in each band of income tax.

Mr. Moore: The latest estimates of the gains from a 1 per cent. increase in personal allowances are shown below:

Marginal tax rate per cent.*	Total gains in a full year £ million
30	180
Total	195

* based on the distribution between marginal rates in 1984-85.

Industrial Wage

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the percentage of the average industrial wage which is represented by (a) the single person's tax allowance and (b) the married couple's tax allowance for each year since 1955.

Mr. Moore: Appendix C of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1982" contains information for tax years up to 1980-81. Figures from 1981-82 to 1984-85 are as follows:

Tax threshold as a percentage of average male manual earnings

	Single person	Married man (without children)
1981-82	20·6	32·1
1982-83	21·8	34·1
1983-84	23·4	36·6
1984-85*	24·7	38·9

* Provisional.

Pound Sterling

Mr. Faulds asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the increase in revenue from oil production for each 1 per cent. fall in the value of the pound sterling against the United States dollar.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 24 January 1985 at column 496.

European Monetary System

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications for the role and powers of the Bank of England of the United Kingdom joining the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom is already a member of the European monetary system but sterling does not participate in the exchange rate mechanism. The question of participation and its implications are kept under review.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications for national control of monetary policy of the United Kingdom joining the European monetary system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The question whether the United Kingdom should join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS, and the implications of doing so, are kept under review. The United Kingdom would not consider joining without giving full consideration to its monetary policy in the conditions of the time.

Corporation Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his intention to permit current cost accounting methods in accordance with "Statement of Standard Accountancy Practice No. 16", issued by the Consultative Committee of Accountancy Bodies to be used for future calculations of liability for corporation tax.

Mr. Moore: I understand the accounting standards committee is considering a possible successor to SSAP16. Current cost profits disclosed by accounts prepared in accordance with SSAP16 may be used in preparing computations of profits for tax purposes, but the various current cost adjustments referred to in the standard must be excluded, as they are neither allowable deductions nor chargeable receipts for tax purposes.

Value Added Tax (Frontier Collection)

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government support the abolition of value added tax collection at European Community frontiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer indicated in his Budget Statement on 13 March 1984, at column 300, we would revert to the system of postponed accounting for VAT on imports if other member states agreed to the Commission's proposals, in the draft 14th directive on VAT, to adopt that system throughout the Community.

Gilt Issues

Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate what proportion of new gilt issues, in the last 12 months for which statistics are available, were purchased by pension funds.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Estimates of the net acquisition of gilt-edged stocks by pension funds are published in "Financial Statistics", table 7.14. Net official sales are published in table 3.5 of "Financial Statistics". In the year to end-September 1984 pension funds net acquisition of gilts represented about 28 per cent. of the value of net official sales.

EC Finance Council

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Economic and Finance Council in Brussels on 11 February.

Mr. Lawson: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council.

The Council discussed the financial framework for the guidance section of the European agricultural guarantee and guidance fund over the next five years. This subject was referred back to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further examination with a view to further discussion at the March Economic and Finance Council. Ministers also discussed tax measures to encourage co-operation between undertakings in different member states.

Investment Income

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the proportion of married couples where both husband and wife are earning who currently have investment income to aggregate.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Allowances

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 7 February, Official Report, column 675, which categories of person would be brought into tax to the extent of £150 million if the value of the married persons allowance and the additional personal allowance were used to increase child benefits.

Mr. Moore: Married couples and single parents with income for income tax purposes — after allowing for reliefs and allowances other than the married man's allowance or the single person's allowance and additional personal allowance — between £2,005 and £3,155 in 1984-85.

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish Government expenditure on housing per head of population in (a) Wales, and the comparable figures for (b) England, (c) Scotland and (d) the United Kingdom for each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish Government expenditure on education per head of population in (a) Wales, and the comparable figures for (b) England and (c) the United Kingdom for each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Customs Staff and Posts

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the numbers of customs staff at seaports, airports and inland premises in Scotland at 31 March 1984, (b) the number of additional customs staff allocated to Scotland since that date and (c) the number of new customs posts which will be allocated to Scotland in 1985-86;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the number of staff from the investigation division of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise attached to individual ports in the United Kingdom, listing the individual ports and the number of such staff in each one;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers of customs staff at seaports, airports and inland premises in Scotland in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensions and Publications (Taxation)

Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received concerning (a) any tax changes in pension arrangements and (b) the possible imposition of value added tax on publications.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 12 February 1985, c. 147-8]: Some 7,000 letters about pension provisions and over 2,000 letters about VAT on publications have been received, in addition to representations from various trade associations, trade unions and other representative bodies.

Economic Policies

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the economic indications by which he judges the success of his economic policies.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 12 February 1985, c. 148]: Inflation is running at less than half the rate inherited in 1979. The economy is experiencing the longest period of economic recovery since 1945. Estimated employment has been rising since the spring of 1983.

Mr. Raison: I discussed the problem as a whole with the United Nations Assistant Secretary General for emergency operations in Ethiopia, Mr. Kurt Jansson, on 12 February. I believe that the massive food and other relief now being provided is reaching those in need, including most of those so identified in Eritrea and Tigré, although clearly there are substantial difficulties in areas where there is civil war. I have been concerned at recent reports about forcible resettlement, but it is difficult to obtain firm evidence. Allegations that money given to relief agencies has been misappropriated are for those agencies to answer, but I am satisfied that the money we are providing to individual agencies is being properly and usefully spent.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the current level of Government aid given to Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I am satisfied that we are doing what we can, both nationally and through the European Community. But further needs will arise as the year goes on, and we shall continue our efforts to meet them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 4 December 1984, Official Report, column 135, what is the most recent information he has as to how much grain has now been promised by each developed country to Ethiopia over the next 12 months; how far this is short of Ethiopia's needs; and in which month each country's promised delivery is likely to arrive in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Commitments of food aid notified to the office of the UN co-ordinator for Ethiopia for the period December 1984 to June 1985 are set out in table 1. Precise figures for the second half of the year are not available, although many donors have indicated their intentions. The UN co-ordinator estimates that completed deliveries plus pledges notified to him will be sufficient to meet the target of 1·2 million tonnes of cereals he set in December 1984. This took account of the country's absorptive capacity and was based on an estimate of 7·6 million people in need of emergency relief.

Forecasts of arrivals of cereals and cereal products at the ports of Assab, Massawa and Djibouti are set out in table II. No firm information is available on shipments after April.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Church-aided Schools (Building Programme)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what allocation is being made in the current year to Oxfordshire county council to assist in building programmes for church-aided schools; and what criteria are used in determining such allocation.

Mr. Dunn: The limit of capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools in Oxfordshire on which the Department will be prepared to pay grant in 1985-86 is £113,000. In determining the distribution of the resources available for building work at voluntary schools, first priority must be given to meeting commitments on projects already under way. Governors' estimates of commitments for 1985-86 proved substantially higher nationally than had been expected. In consequence, it has been possible to approve only those new projects which are statutorily required to meet "basic need"—for new school places in areas of population growth—or to implement proposals approved under section 13 of the Education Act 1980.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would be the cost at current prices, in both capital and revenue terms, if a place in nursery education were to be provided in September 1985 for every child aged three and four years old; and what is his estimate of the cost if that were done for September 1988.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Budgetary Discipline)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the steps taken by the Commission and the various Councils of Ministers to fulfill the conditions linked to the agreement on increased own resources made at the Fontainebleu summit relating to budgetary discipline.

The Prime Minister: The Council of Ministers (Foreign Affairs) at the meeting in Dublin on 4 December adopted detailed arrangements to implement budgetary discipline. Article 10 of the Council conclusions adopted provides that budgetary discipline will apply to the 1986 budget and to Council decisions taken in 1985 affecting expenditure in 1986. The Commission has stated that its agricultural proposals for 1985 are within the agricultural guideline figure for 1986. Those proposals will be discussed by the Council of Ministers (Agriculture) on 25/26 February. Discussion of the 1986 budget has not yet begun.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what mechanism has been established to monitor the effective budgetary descipline which the Council of Ministers agreed as a condition of increasing the Common Market's own resources at the Fontainebleu Council; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The text agreed unanimously by the Council of Ministers on 4 December fulfils the European Council's request that the measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of budgetary discipline be adopted. Under the new procedures, Finance Ministers have been given an important role in ensuring that spending decisions are compatible with the requirements of budgetary discipline.

Military Plutonium

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of the statement made by the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Kinross and West Perthshire (Sir A. Douglas-Home) on 21 April 1964, Official Report, column 1098, that military plutonium production was being gradually terminated, she will make a statement on progress to date in this regard.

The Prime Minister: It is not in the national interest to give details of defence plutonium production; however, it is kept to the minimum required to meet defence needs.

Military Reactors

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of evidence given to the Sizewell inquiry about the use of military reactors, Her Majesty's Government will now answer parliamentary questions about such reactors to the extent consonant with essential national security; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government will continue to answer questions about the use of military reactors to the extent consonant with national security.

Hill Farmers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what is the purpose of the moneys paid out of the Exchequer to hill farmers; and if she will publish in the Official Report particulars of such moneys paid out in each of the past five years together with particulars of any moneys paid out by the EEC during the same period.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave him on 31 January 1985. Details of support to agriculture in hill areas are given in table 28 of the White Paper on the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423).

Absence from Office (Contact Arrangements)

Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister if, at any time during her holiday last summer, she was not contactable from London by telephone.

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will list the occasions in 1984 when she was out of the country on official business; and by what means she could be contacted by her officials on each occasion;

(2) what arrangements she made in 1984 for officials to be able to contact her whilst she was on holiday.

The Prime Minister: I was out of the country on official business on the following occasions during 1984:

Date
23 January	France
26–27 February	Italy
2–3 February	Hungary
13-14 February	Soviet Union

EMPLOYMENT

Redundancies

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give the latest figures since 29 February 1984 for the number of firms announcing redundancies in (i) the Wirral and (ii) Birkenhead;

(2) if he will give the figures since 29 February 1984 for the number of redundancies and closures in Birkenhead and Merseyside.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is given in the following table:

Redundacies confirmed as due to occur from 1 March 1984 to 31 December 1984†*

	Wirral local authority area‡	Birkenhead jobcentre area	Merseyside Metropolitan county‡

Closures: number of establishments	6	Nil	56
Redundancies involved in closures	157	Nil	3,663

Notes:

* Confirmation by the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur and based on notifications of impending redundancies involving 10 or more workers.

† Includes provisional figures for December.

‡ Groupings of jobcentre areas approximating to the area.

‖ Firms which have made redundancies on more than one occasion during the period are counted more than once.

Computotech Ltd.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is satisfied with the management of Computotech Ltd of Manpower Services Commission schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Computotech has been providing training of the quality and standards required by the Manpower Services Commission. I am informed that Computotech Holdings Ltd. and a number of its subsidiaries have been put into receivership, and this resulted in the closure earlier this week of Computotech's schemes in London. The remaining schemes are continuing to operate. All trainees who have been affected by the London closure will continue to be paid their allowances by the commission, and arrangements are being made to transfer them to new schemes or courses as soon as possible. The commission is, of course, keeping the remaining schemes under the closest review.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Renton: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication, on 9 February 1984, of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

UN Commission for Africa

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what attitude was taken by Her Majesty's Government to the provision of a new conference centre for the United Nations Commission for Africa in Addis Ababa.

Mr. Renton: At the 1984 General Assembly the United Kingdom voted against provision of new conference facilities for the UN Economic Commission for Africa. United Kingdom representatives stressed that at a time of severe economic hardhship in Africa the United Nations should concentrate resources on helping directly to alleviate these conditions.

Declaration of Decolonisation

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will dissociate the United Kingdom from the United Nations' celebration of the 25th anniversary of the declaration of decolonisation.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom voted against the 1984 General Assembly resolution endorsing the United Nations programme of activities to observe this anniversary on the grounds that there were more pressing priorities for the funds to be allocated to the programme. We are considering our participation in the celebrations in the light of that vote.

UN (Expenditure Savings)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to seek the saving of expenditure by the United Nations by opposing any project which is, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, unnecessary or frivolous.

Mr. Renton: It is our consistent policy to press for improved efficiency of United Nations operations through the curtailment of unnecessary, frivolous or otherwise ineffective programmes. Further, United Kingdom representatives recently emphasised that programmes of proven value should be financed by savings elsewhere in UN programmes and not by new money.

El Salvador

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 7 November 1984, Official Report, column 4, what colleges in Britain will be receiving El Salvadorean officers; what is the estimated cost of this assistance; what subjects will be studied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We are still discussing with the Salvadorean authorities which courses would be suitable for the one or two officers to whom places have been offered in Britain.

TRANSPORT

Transport Bill

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport who he consulted on the proposal for bus substitution contained in the Transport Bill.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend announced proposals for legislation on bus substitution services on 21

June 1984. In formulating those proposals he took account of the views of the Select Committee on Transport, which commented positively on bus substitution in its report of May 1983; and of the views of the chairman of the British Railways Board. Since announcing his proposals my right hon. Friend has further consulted the British Railways Board, and has also sought the views of the Central Transport Consultative Committee, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the London Boroughs' Association.

Road Safety and Traffic Management

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the terms of reference of the review body to be headed by Dr. Peter North to deal with questions relating to road safety and traffic management; and to what extent he will propose to await its recommendations before taking action on the recent report on road safety by the Transport Committee.

Mrs. Chalker: The terms of reference of the review body were set out in the reply of 31 January of my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley). These include simplification of the law as proposed in recommendation XXV of the Transport Committee's report. In other respects I see no need to await the review body's recommendations before responding to the Transport Committee.

Russian Ships (British Ports)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if the information given to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East in his letter of 11 January, about the continuing entry to British ports of Soviet merchant and passenger vessels, has been communicated to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

(2) what discussions are taking place, or are proposed, with the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concerning continued access to British ports by Soviet merchant vessels.

Mr. David Mitchell: There have been a number of discussions between my Department and the Soviet authorities concerning possible amendments to the Anglo-Soviet treaty of merchant navigation. It would not be appropriate to reveal the proposals that have been made by either side while these discussions are continuing.

Heavy Lorries

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether a driver not holding a heavy goods vehicle licence is permitted to drive a vehicle whose weight is below the gross 7·5 tonnes qualifying limit at which a heavy goods vehicle licence is required but which is pulling a standard drawbar trailer whose weight is such as to bring the combined gross weight of the vehicle and trailer to over 7·5 tonnes.

Mrs. Chalker: No.

Goods Vehicles (Testing)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with representatives of the transport industry about the weight threshold for the plating and testing of goods vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Under present arrangements, all goods vehices over 1525 kg unladen weight are subject to the Goods Vehicles (Plating and Testing) Regulations 1982, which require, amongst other things, an annual roadworthiness test at a Department of Transport heavy goods vehicle testing station. Vehicles below this threshold are subject only to the normal MOT test.

The use of an unladen weight threshold for these purposes is inconsistent with other legislation, where gross weights are now commonly used, and it has been put to me by representatives of vehicle body builders that there would be road safety advantages in moving to a gross weight threshold for plating and testing purposes also. My officials have therefore started informal discussions with representatives of the various sectors of the industry about possible ways of securing a change on these lines.

There are a number of implications associated with any change to the plating and testing threshold and any arrangements could not be implemented for some time. Nevertheless, I have broad sympathy with the case for change, and I hope that it will be possible to reach a satisfactory solution acceptable to all parties.

If the present discussions are successful, therefore, I hope to bring forward firm proposals for change in due course.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

South Africa (Company Interests)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out for each year since the implementation of the proposals in "Code of Conduct for Companies with Interests in South Africa", Cmnd. 7233, the number of companies expected to lodge reports with his Department; how many reports have been lodged; and what is the number of these which have been deemed satisfactory.

Mr. Fletcher: The numbers of companies which have reported each year since the publication of Cmnd. 7233 were given in table 1 of the latest "Analysis and Summary of Companies' Reports" presented to Parliament on 10 April 1984 and which is available in the Library of the House. The same table also recorded the numbers of companies believed to have a responsibility to submit a full report under the code, but which declined to do so. Companies whose reports fail satisfactorily to provide all the information required are on every occasion approached for additional details. But records have not been kept of the few times when that has been necessary.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further plans he has for changing the role and resources of the British Overseas Trade Board; what representations he has received on the subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Amateur Radio Licence

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the Radio Society of Great Britain in relation to the introduction of a novice amateur radio licence.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 30 January 1985, c. 218]: The Radio Society of Great Britain, which represents the interest of United Kingdom radio amateurs, has put forward proposals for a provisional or novice licence in the past, but it has not done so in recent times because, I understand, doubts have been expressed as to whether a novice facility is in the best interests of amateur radio. My Department requires radio amateurs to achieve a minimum standard of proficiency and there are fears that introducing a lower standard for novices would cause interference to other services. Officials in the radio regulatory division of my Department have regular meetings with the society, and although no formal proposals have been put forward recently on this subject, it remains under discussion.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for 1984, in league order, the 10 countries known to him to have the highest top rate of income tax (a) on earned income and (b) on all income, including investment income; and if he will include details for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moore: The information available for other countries is given in the tables. The top rate of income tax in the United Kingdom is 60 per cent. on all income.

Notes
1. The tables give the rate of tax for the latest year for which firm information is available.
2. The rates for investment income may not relate to all types of investment income.
3. Local income taxes have, where chargeable, been taken into account at typical rates.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the yield if value added tax were to be extended (a) to the construction of commercial property and (b) to financial services.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the net additional revenue from extending value added tax at the standard rate to the construction of commercial property would be of the order of £300 million at 1984-85 prices. The application of the tax to financial services would raise difficult technical problems, and I regret that it is not possible to give a meaningful estimate of the likely yield.

Lodging Allowances

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his current estimate of the cost of exempting married persons from taxation on lodging allowances paid whilst working away from home; and what would be the additional cost of extending this concession to single persons;

(2) if he has any plans to exempt single people from taxation on lodging allowances.

Mr. Moore: I assume the hon. Member refers to the lodging allowance an employee may receive from his employer when he is required to work temporarily away from his usual place of employment and it is impracticable to expect him to travel home on a daily basis. Providing the allowance reimburses the employee's additional costs of accommodation, it is not taxable income whether received by a married or a sigle person. Information is not available centrally on which to base an estimate of the cost of not taxing lodging allowances paid in these circumstances.

If the hon. Member has another point in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Pound Sterling

Mr. Faulds asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what relationship is assumed or predicted by the Treasury model of the economy between each United States 1 cent. reduction in the value o the pound sterling and (a) the value per barrel of North sea oil production and (b) the revenue derived by the Treasury from that production.

Mr. Moore: At current levels of the dollar-sterling exchange rate and dollar oil prices a 1 cent. fall in the value of sterling against the dollar would raise sterling oil prices by about 1 per cent. Other things being equal, a 1 per cent. increase in sterling oil prices is expected to raise North sea revenues by about £150 million in a full year.

Statistical Information

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government accept the desirability of the introduction of new technology so that statistical information no longer has to be collected at European Community frontiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is, of course, desirable that new technology should be used wherever possible and on a cost-effective basis to collect information in a way which will minimise delays at European Community frontiers. The United Kingdom already has efficient computer systems which directly collect statistics for about three quarters of all import traffic. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has plans to extend the scope and capability of these systems and is considering, in particular, whether it will be possible to use them to collect statistics on exports.

The European Community is evolving a plan for co-ordinating the development of member states' computer systems in order to maximise the benefits of new technology for intra-Community trade. Her Majesty's Goverment will lend full support to any proposals which are conducive to the reduction of frontier delays, provided that any investment in the systems or developments proposed is properly appraised and justified.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Baldry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of a male worker's average earnings went in tax and national insurance contributions in the following years: 1955, 1964, 1970, 1979, and for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: Information for a married man on average male manual earnings, assuming no tax reliefs and allowances other than the married man's allowance and NIC at the contracted-in rate, is as follows:

Average rate of tax plus NIC

	Percentage of gross earnings
1955-56	10·0
1964-65	17·6
1970-71	24·8
1979-80	25·4
1984-85	*27·6

* Provisional.

Books and Newspapers (VAT)

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further representations he has received on the possible introduction of value added tax on books and newspapers.

Mr. Hayhoe: Over 2,000 representations about the imposition of VAT on books, newspapers and periodicals.

Taxation

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on revenue accruing to the Exchequer of changes in income tax paid at above basic rate, arising only from the change in the tax threshold in each year since 1979.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 7 February 1985, c. 673]: If in 1984-85 the main personal allowances had each been replaced by the corresponding 1978-79 allowances, indexed to 1984-85 levels by reference to the statutory formula, there would have been an additional liability to tax at rates in excess of the basic rate of about £30 million in a full year.

Tax Revenue

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effect on revenue in 1984-85 of the decisions made in Budgets from 1982 onwards to raise higher tax bands over and above the rate of inflation.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 11 February 1985, c. 61]: If the 1981-82 basic rate limit and higher rate income tax bands were indexed to 1984-85 by reference to the statutory formula and substituted for those currently in force, the direct revenue effect would be a yield of about £270 million in a full year at 1984-85 levels of income.

Customs Staff and Posts

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the number of staff from the investigation division of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise attached to individual ports in the United Kingdom, listing the individual ports and the number of such staff in each one.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 291-2]: The investigation division of Customs and Excise is mainly based in London but also has a number of provincial offices. None of its staff is specifically attached to or responsible for individual ports.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the numbers of customs staff at seaports, airports and inland premises in Scotland at 31 March 1984, (b) the number of additional Customs staff allocated to Scotland since that date and (c) the number of new Customs posts which will be allocated to Scotland in 1985-86.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 291-2]: The information is as follows:

(a) Four hundred and thirty-nine.
(b) Four, but staffing levels at Glasgow airport have been reduced by three.
(c) Eight.

ENVIRONMENT

Public Sector Housing

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how many dwellings in the public sector tenanted by elderly and infirm residents have been left unoccupied by their tenants because such tenants are too old or infirm ever to return.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Rate Capping

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the London borough of Brent about the effect of his rate capping proposals on their ability to maintain and improve homes transferred to them from the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: No such representations have been received.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service. The recommendations contained in the programme are being pursued in my Department through a subcommittee of the General Whitley council.

Local Government Reform

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many applications for consents under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, made to him by 31 January, involve a financial consideration of less than £500;

(2) how many applications for consents under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 made to him by 31 January 1985 involve no financial consideration.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Financial considerations are not always a material factor in determining applications under section 8 of the Act and such details have not been supplied or sought in every case. Of cases where financial details were supplied, 1,120 involved a sale price or periodic rental of less than £500 and 703 of these involved no financial consideration.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many applications for consents under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, made to him by 31 January 1985, are still outstanding;

(2) how many applications for consents under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 made to him by 31 January 1985 are still outstanding.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Thirty-one applications under section 8 and 15 applications under section 9.

In at least 16 cases further information is awaited from the local authority.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total cost of Government Departments so far incurred in processing applications by the six metropolitan county councils for consents under sections 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Estimates across Government Departments are not collected centrally; and no distinctions made for these purposes between the sections of the Act.

The cost of Department of Environment staff, including associated accommodation and administrative costs, engaged on processing specific applications from the metropolitan county councils for consent under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Act in the period up to 31 January 1985 was approximately £55,000.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average value of contracts for which consent has been sought under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 by 31 January 1985.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The number of contracts involved is not necessarily a material consideration in determining applications for consent under section 9 of the Act. Such information is not always provided.

The average value of applications received by 31 January 1985 under section 9 is £1,192,300. This figure excludes any cases where financial details were not provided.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for consents under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, made to him by 31 January 1985, were for (a) police vehicles, (b) fire service vehicles and appliances, (c) police clothing, (d) fire service clothing and (e) fuel; and what is the average contract value for each category.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Details of applications received for consent under section 9 of the Act in respect of each category are as follows:

Category	Number of applications received by 31 January 1985	Average application value (£)
(a) Police Vehicles	3	414,534

Category	Number of applications received by 31 January 1985	Average application value (£)
(b) Fire Service vehicles and appliances (including those for airports use)	6	507,059
(c) Police clothing	None	—
(d) Fire service clothing	2	157,328
(e) Fuel	4	2,566,365

Severe Weather Costs

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will give financial assistance to local authorities, as in previous years, for snow clearing, gritting and salting, where the cost is greater than the product of a 1p rate;

(2) whether expenditure on snow clearing, gritting and salting will be disregarded for grant penalty purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Local Government Practices and Procedures

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the interim report from the inquiry into local government practices and procedures will be made; and if it will be made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I consider it reasonable to look to the committee of inquiry to submit an interim report by the end of July. It is customary for published reports of this nature to be made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when appointments to the committee of inquiry into local government practices and procedures will be finalised.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State advised the House on 6 February, further appointments to the committee of inquiry will be made shortly.

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a list of grant allocations to each local authority for 1985-86 under the homes insulation scheme, calculating for each authority the percentage increase or decrease on the 1984-85 grant.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 21 January at column 316. It is misleading to make comparisons between the allocations for the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 on an authority by authority basis, since 25 per cent. of the allocation for 1985-86 is being held in reserve for distribution to authorities as justified by demand. Such comparisons would be further distorted by underspending in 1984-85, which is likely to amount to about £4 million.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the grants made under the homes insulation scheme in 1984-85 he anticipates will go to householders increasing the amount of insulation rather than installing insulation for the first time.

Sir George Young: Latest figures indicate that during the second quarter of 1984-85, 11,000 grants were paid to householders topping up existing loft insulation, compared with some 49,000 grants to those installing insulation for the first time.

Since the homes insulation scheme was extended only to grant aid topping up on 20 July 1984, this ratio does not necessarily represent a reliable guide to the financial year as a whole.

Private Water Supplies

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report those EEC regulations and directives relating to the standards of quality and inspection of private water supplies which are to be brought into force in the present year; and what consultations have taken place with the bodies whose duty it will be to implement any such changes in the law.

Mr. Gow: The EC directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption (80/778/EEC) will apply to all drinking water supplies and comes into operation on 15 July this year. My Department consulted those associations representing the bodies which in England and Wales will be implementing the directive in relation to private supplies, including the Association of District Councils, and the London Boroughs Association.

DOE circular 25/84—Welsh Office Circular 51/84—was sent to local authorities in England and Wales on 18 October 1984 to guide them on their duties under the directive.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the report of the consultation exercise on the principles to be applied in assessing new disposal facilities for low and intermediate level radioactive wastes.

Mr. Waldegrave: The report has been published today and I have placed copies in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Salmon

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has now dropped his proposals for the tagging of salmon.

Mr. John MacKay: Consideration of the possibility of introducing a salmon-tagging scheme is continuing and it is hoped to reach conclusions in the near future. Consultations with interested parties have identified a number of difficulties which require careful study.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he is considering to ensure the survival of the salmon.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 24 January 1985 at columns 517-18.

In addition, consideration is being given to the possibility of introducing a system of salmon sales control and a review of existing salmon legislation in Scotland is under way.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has received the submission from the Lothian health board on the closure of the Bruntsfield and Deaconess hospitals; and if he is in a position to indicate when he is likely to announce his decision.

Mr. John MacKay: Lothian health board submitted to my right hon. Friend formal closure proposals in respect of the Deaconess and Bruntsfield hospitals on 6 February.

Otherwise, I have nothing to add to what was said in the reply to the hon. Member on 28 January.

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the grants made under the homes insulation scheme in 1984-85 he anticipates will go to householders increasing the amount of insulation rather than installing insulation for the first time.

Mr. Ancram: I estimate that the proportion will be of the order of 21 per cent.

Broadleaved Woodland (Felling Licences)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date the Forestry Commission issued felling licences for broadleaved woods; of these, how many licences had conditions requiring the replanting purely of broadleaved trees; and how many hectares of woodland this totalled in each period.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

		Licences which required replanting with broadleaves only
	Number of licences issued	Number of licences	Area (hectares)
Year ended 31 March 1983	421	143	262
Year ended 31 March 1984	386	117	227
Nine months ended 31 December 1984	155	69	110

In addition, a significant number of licences were issued requiring restocking with a mixture of broadleaves and conifers, designed to lead eventually to woodlands of a predominantly broadleaved character.

Broadleaves

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Forestry Commission has met representatives of local authorities in the United Kingdom since September 1984 to discuss broadleaves in Britain; and what changes in consultation procedures for felling licence and broadleaved woodland grant applications were discussed.

Mr. John MacKay: No, but representatives of local authority associations have been invited to the broadleaves in Britain seminar to be held in May.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representatives from the Country Landowners Association, the Countryside Commission, the Countryside Commission for Scotland, the Institute of Chartered Foresters, the National Farmers Union, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors and Timber Growers UK have been invited to attend the broadleaves in Britain seminar organised by the Forestry Commission for 8 May.

Mr. John MacKay: One representative has been invited from each of these bodies except for the Nature Conservancy Council and Timber Growers UK, which have been invited to send two.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why the Forestry Commission has restricted its invitations to the seminar on broadleaves in Britain on 8 May to only 22 organisations; and why many of those organisations have been invited to send only a single representative.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has been concerned to keep the numbers of persons attending the seminar within manageable proportions in order to ensure a constructive discussion. It has, however, extended its list of invited organisations to 27.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria the Forestry Commission used in deciding which conservation groups should be invited to the seminar on 8 May at which it will present its revised policies on broadleaves in Britain.

Mr. John MacKay: Given the need to restrict the numbers attending the seminar, the criterion was to select bodies which would provide a balanced representation of conservation interest.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria the Forestry Commission's working group on broadleaves in Britain used in deciding which non-governmental organisations it would consult privately before presenting its revised policies in May.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission's working group has had meetings with such non-government organisations as it felt necessary to consult over particular aspects of its developing policy proposals.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether representatives of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland have met the Forestry Commission since September 1984 to discuss broadleaves in Britain and its revision of policies for broadleaved woodlands.

Mr. John MacKay: No, but officials have been in regular contact and a meeting has been arranged for later this month to discuss this matter.

Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those individuals and statutory or non-statutory organisations which submitted criticisms on the Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984; if he will detail the nature of these criticisms; in each case specifically when each criticism was received by his Department; and if he will list the criticisms he intends to accommodate in the new draft.

Mr. John MacKay: Criticisms were received from Dr. J. Carr (14 September 1984); Lord Northfield (21 October 1984); Mr. K. W. Woodvine (23 October 1984); The British Deer Society (30 October 1984); The Gun Trade Association (26 November 1984); Mr. J. Hotchkis (3 December 1984); and Mr. J. R. Seago (17 January 1985). Criticisms mainly concerned the circumstances in which shotguns might be used and the specification of ammunition for rifles. My right hon. Friend expects to meet some but not all of the points made. For details I would ask the hon. Member to await the draft order which will be laid before Parliament shortly.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what constituted the apparent irregularity in the laying procedure of the draft Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Some corrections made to the draft order after it had been laid were not submitted to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he made a public statement or formally indicated the withdrawal of the draft Deer (Firearms Etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: A press release was issued on 27 November 1984, the date on which the draft order was withdrawn. In addition, all those involved in consultations were informed by letter.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. Steven Owen

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Mr. Steven Owen of Musselburgh was held in police custody for three days between 9 February and 12 February awaiting court proceedings arising from a parking ticket; and if he is satisfied that the appropriate notice for Mr. Owen to appear in the East Lothian district court on 23 January was served on him by the police in the appropriate manner.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am having a full inquiry made into all the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member and I shall write to him as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

TA Centres

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Territorial Army centres are guarded by Territorial Army personnel and not by regular soldiers; and if he will list the centres so guarded.

Mr. Lee: Whenever possible, if it is necessary to guard Territorial Army centres, they are guarded by Territorial Army personnel, unless the centres are within regular Army establishments for which regular troops have overall responsibility.

Defence Land

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of defence land holdings have been released following the recommendations of the Nugent committee report; and what new land holdings have been acquired by his Department since its publication in 1973.

Mr. Lee: Defence land holdings have reduced by 7·6 per cent. since April 1973. I regret that details of acquisitions are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the recommendations of the Nugent committee on defence land holdings concerning the disposal of the Ministry of Defence site at Lydney and Aston Down, Gloucestershire, East Riggs, Dumfriesshire, Pershore, Worcestershire, Watchett/Doniford, Somerset, Wrekin, Shropshire, Ollerton, Nottinghamshire, Netley, Hampshire and Perranporth, Cornwall have been fully carried out.

Mr. Lee: The recommendations of the Nugent report have been fully carried out at Lydney, Watchet/Doniford, Netley and Perranporth. Four hundred acres of land at Pershore and 370 acres at Aston Down have been passed to the Property Services Agency for disposal. Approximately 1,050 acres of leased land at Ollerton has been given up.

The range at the Wrekin and East Riggs have been retained for defence use.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the two Army sites situated at Manorbier, Dyfed have been disposed of as recommended by the Nugent committee report.

Mr. Lee: The East Moor cliff training area and 184 acres of the firing range at manorbrier have been sold; 102 acres of the range head have been retained.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the RAF site at North Luffenham, Rutland, has been disposed of following the decision to move its facilities to RAF Benson and RAF Digby, in accordance with the recommendations of the Nugent report on defence land.

Mr. Lee: Some 75 acres of land were passed for disposal at North Luffenham following the review suggested by the Nugent committee.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, following the recommendations of the Nugent committee report on defence land, it has been practicable for land outside the main site at Yoxter, Somerset to be disposed of.

Mr. Lee: To date it has not been practicable but the matter is being kept under review.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent the recommendations of the Nugent committee report have been carried out concerning the Dartmoor complex in Devon, 250 acres of land at Swinderby, Lincolnshire, Watton, Norfolk, Sealand, Cheshire, Irvine, Ayrshire, and 600 acres of land at Cronwell, Lincolshire.

Mr. Lee: All of the recommendations concerning the Dartmoor complex have been carried out. The range at Irvine has been sold and 600 acres of land at Cranwell have been passed to the Property Service Agency for disposal. Some 88 acres have been disposed of at Watton but the remainder of the site and the land at Swinderby has been

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Official Secrets Act 1911

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions there have been since 1955 under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911; of these prosecutions, how many resulted in convictions; and what was the average term of imprisonment imposed.

The Attorney-General: Proceedings under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 have been instituted against 51 persons and one company since 1955. The charges against four defendants were withdrawn at the magistrates' court. Thirty-six were prosecuted to conviction and nine were acquitted. In one case the defendant was discharged by examining justices in respect of all save one charge which was withdrawn, and two cases remain pending. Fifteen of those convicted received immediate custodial sentences. The average length of 14 of those sentences was 15 months. The remaining custodial sentence of four years included penalties for other offences.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Attorney-General if he is satisfied with the operation of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911.

The Attorney-General: My responsibility is for the enforcement of the law as it stands. I am satisfied that it is enforced sensibly and fairly.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Attorney-General how many civil servants have been prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act in each of the last 10 years; and if he will break down the figures according to the section of the Act under which the prosecution was brought.

The Attorney-General: The following table provides details of the prosecutions against civil servants under sections 1 and 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 for 1974 and subsequent years. There were no prosecutions other than under sections 1 and 2.

	Prosecutions under section 1	Prosecutions under section 2

* Withdrawn at magistrates court.
† Plus one pending.

Mr. John Morris asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions there have been under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act (a) since 1979 and (b) since 1955.

The Attorney-General: Proceedings under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 have been instituted against 51 persons and one company since 1955 and against 20 persons since 1979.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report the guidelines regarding prosecution to which he referred in his statement of 12 February, Official Report, column 180.

The Attorney-General: The guidelines regarding prosecution to which I referred in my statement of 12 February 1985 was the document setting out the criteria for prosecution which I drew up for the guidance of all who prosecute on behalf of the public, and published in February 1983. The issue of these guidelines was one of the interim measures announced on 27 July 1982 by my right hon. and noble Friend the then Home Secretary pending the introduction of a prosecution service independent of the police. A copy of these guidelines was placed in the Library of the House on 14 February 1983.

At the same time they were drawn to the attention of chief officers of police and other bodies with a prosecution function by my right hon. and noble Friend the then Home Secretary. My Department has supplied copies of these guidelines as and when they have been requested, and I am satisfied that no further publication of them is required at this time.

Mr. Madden asked the Attorney-General on how many occasions he had consultations with Ministers in 1984 in respect of senior civil servants being prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: None.

Jurors (Political Affiliations)

Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy, in all future cases to be tried by jury, to instruct Crown counsel to object to the empanelment of any juror known to have political affiliations which in his opinion could call in question the ability of that juror to reach an objective verdict on the basis of the evidence.

The Attorney-General: It is not open to counsel to challenge a prospective juror before he is empanelled. The occasion for making such a challenge arises only at the point where persons who are already on the panel and have been selected by ballot to try a particular case come forward to be sworn for that purpose. I assume that this is what my hon. Friend intended to refer to.

If any facts are known to prosecuting counsel which lead him to doubt the impartiality of a particular juror, he may then ask that juror to stand by for the Crown. If this leaves an insufficient number of persons to constitute the jury on the panel that has been summoned, counsel may then challenge the juror for cause. Whether that challenge is well-founded and should therefore be upheld will be decided by the trial judge.

A juror's political affiliations would not, in themselves, constitute a ground for asking him to stand by or for challenging him for cause unless, in the words of the guidelines on jury checks, which I published in July 1980 and a copy of which is in the Library of the House, his 'political beliefs are so biased as to go beyond normally reflecting the broad spectrum of views and interests in the community to reflect the extreme views of sectarian interest or pressure group to a degree which might interfere with his fair assessment of the facts of the case or lead him to exert improper pressure on his fellow jurors.'

The jury checks which are authorised by the guidelines are limited in scope and would not be expected to disclose political affiliations which were not of the extreme character that I have just described.

Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984

Mr. Chope asked the Attorney-General on what date part III of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984 will be brought into effect.

The Attorney-General: It is intended to bring part III of the Act into force in July.

Mr. Chope asked the Attorney-General on what date he expects the drafting of the new rules of court under part III of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984 to be completed.

The Attorney-General: It is intended that the necessary rules will be drafted and submitted for consideration to members of the Matrimonial Causes Rule Committee in March.

Greenham Common Demonstrators (Legal Aid)

Mr. Madden asked the Attorney-General how many people charged with offences at or near Greenham Common over the last year have applied for legal aid; how many such applications have been refused; how many appeals against refusal to grant legal aid have been upheld by the area legal aid committee; and if any direction has been issued advising that legal aid should be withheld from any person charged with offences at or near Greenham Common.

The Attorney-General: Information distinguishing applicants for legal aid who were charged with offences arising at or near Greenham Common could only be obtained from the courts and the Law Society at disproportionate cost. No such direction as is suggested has been issued.

Mr. Clive Ponting

Mr. Madden asked the Attorney-General on what date Clive Ponting was charged under the Official Secrets Act; from what force was the officer who charged him; and if Clive Ponting was charged at any time with any other offence in connection with passing papers to any hon. Member.

The Attorney-General: Clive Ponting was charged on 17 August 1984 with an offence contrary to section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 by an officer of the Ministry of Defence police. He was at no time charged with any other offence.

Mr. Madden asked the Attorney-General when the Director of Public Prosecutions was first notified that papers from the Ministry of Defence, relating to Clive Ponting, had been passed to an hon. Member; when papers relating to this matter were first referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions; if the Department of Public Prosecutions was asked to advise (a) on whether any offence had arisen specifically under the Official Secrets Act and (b) as to whether any other offence had been committed; and if the Director of Public Prosecutions was asked to offer advice according to the general criteria previously understood to concern the Director of Public Prosecutions in giving advice on whether proceedings are appropriate.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions was first notified of the unauthorised disclosure of papers from the MOD to an hon. Member in an oral report by a senior officer of that Ministry at 11 am on 13 August 1984. Certain documents were handed at the time to the DPP, who, after consultation with the Solicitor-General, asked for a very early police report which was submitted to the Director on 16 August 1984. Referral by the Ministry of Defence to the DPP was for the purpose of a decision whether to prosecute and not for advice.

The possible offence disclosed by the facts reported to the DPP was an offence under the Official Secrets Act 1911. In recommending to the Solicitor-General that consent should be given to a prosecution, the Director of Public Prosecutions had regard to the guidance as to criteria for prosecution which I published in March 1983 (a copy of which is in the Library of the House).

ENVIRONMENT

Use Classes Order

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider revising the Use Classes Order to clarify whether the proposed special housing development for single people with medical or social problems or related matters is a material change of use requiring planning permission.

Mr. Macfarlane: Planning permission is not needed for the occupation of dwelling-houses by single people with medical or social problems provided that no material change of use is involved, nor for any change of use falling within class XIV of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972. The position is elaborated in the memorandum submitted by my Department to the Social Services Select Committee on 27 July 1984. I will consider whether further clarification is needed, and, if so, what form it might take, together with any recommendations on this matter which the Select Committee may make in its report to the House.

Gipsies (Designated Sites)

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have designated sites for gipsies under the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Macfarlane: According to the returns submitted by district councils in January this year, a total of 230 gipsy sites have been provided in the areas of 24 London boroughs and 156 district councils in England.

Caravan Sites Act 1968

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last reviewed the operation of the Caravan Sites Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The operation of the Act is kept under constant review. Changes were last introduced in 1980 when, by amendments enacted in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act, provision was made for Exchequer capital grant to local authorities for the cost of developing sites. We also simplified the enforcement powers available to authorities whose areas are designated under section 12 of the 1968 Act. I have no plans for further amendments at present.

GLC (Staff)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to how many staff have entered the employment of the Greater London council in the last 12 months;

(2) what information he has as to how many staff have left the Greater London council's employment in the last 12 months.

Sir George Young: The information requested is not held centrally.

Rochdale Metropolitan District (Grants)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total amount of all Government grants paid to the Rochdale metropolitan district in the last five years, including an estimate for 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: The available information is given in the following table:

Government grants to the metropolitan borough of Rochdale

* The rate support grant system changed in 1981-82. Figures for earlier years are not on a comparable basis. The figures for 1978-79 to 1980-81 include the needs, resources and domestic elements. Thereafter they include block grant and domestic rate relief grant. The figures up to 1981-82 are final entitlement. Those for 1982-83 to 1984-85 are latest estimates after holdback. The 1985-86 figure assumes that the authority will spend at target.

† The figures for 1978-79 to 1982-83 are for rent and rebates. Those for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are for housing benefit. The 1984-85 figure is provisional. No estimate is available for 1985-86.

‡ The figures for 1982-83 to 1984-85 are subject to adjustment on the basis of final audited claims. No estimate can be made for 1985-86.

‖ These include relevant and non-relevant specific grants and capital grants. Figures are not available for 1984-85 and estimates cannot be made for that year or 1985-86.

Water Authorties (Rate Poundage)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report details for the latest available period of the average equated rate poundage in respect of unmeasured water supply for each water authority in England.

Mr. Macfarlane: The following table gives details of the equated water rate for unmeasured water supply for the financial year 1984-85.

Water Authority	Equated Water Rate—pence per £ Rateable Value
North West	17·96
Northumbrian	26·95
Severn-Trent	16·70
Yorkshire	27·70
Anglian	20·55
Thames	11·75
Southern	17·47
Wessex	22·40
South West	23·90
English average	16·83

Note: The equated rate is the rate poundage which would apply if no standing charges were levied.

Bedfordshire Structure Plan

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to grant an examination in public following application by the Bedfordshire county council for (a) general amendments to the Bedfordshire structure plan and (b) a specific amendment to the plan prohibiting the deposit of nuclear waste in the county.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend proposes to hold an examination in public to consider selected matters raised by the proposed alterations to current policies in the Bedfordshire structure plan. He does not propose to examine in public the second alteration which proposes a new policy on nuclear waste. Any specific proposal for the deposit of nuclear waste at Elstow will be dealt with under the procedures announced by my right hon. Friend in the House on 24 January.

Energy Conservation and Homes Insulation

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report all grants available to householders for energy conservation and home insulation.

Sir George Young: Grants under the homes insulation scheme are available towards the cost of insulating the lofts of dwellings with less than 30mm of existing insulation, together with the associated lagging of tanks and pipes in the loft and the provision of a hot water tank jacket.

Supplementary benefit recipients may obtain from local DHSS offices single payments for draught proofing materials and hot water tank jackets.

In addition the Energy Efficiency Office makes seedcorn and pump-priming grants to voluntary bodies who carry out measures such as loft insulation and draught stripping.

Retail Chains (Planning Appeals)

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions in the latest 12 months for which figures are available he has overruled his inspector's recommendations (a) to refuse a planning appeal by retail chains for the construction of a retail outlet of over 5,000 sq ft and (b) to accept a planning appeal on the same terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: In 1984 my right hon. Friend allowed appeals relating to this type of proposed development in three cases where the inspector had recommended dismissal. In no cases did he dismiss such an appeal where the inspector had recommended in favour of allowing it.

Housing Grants (Leicester)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what grants were made to the city of Leicester council for (a) home improvement purposes and (b) council house maintenance and improvements in 1974 and each subsequent year up to the latest year for which figures are available; if he will estimate the figure for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Exchequer contributions towards expenditure on home improvement grants paid in Leicester city council from 1973-74 onwards were:

(Figures in £000's)

Year
1973	103·2
1974-75	133·1
1975-76	185·0
1976-77	255·8
1977-78	309·7
1978-79	404·5
1979-80	541·5
1980-81	8·11·6
1981-82	1,296·0
1982-83	2,070·5
1983-84*	2,871·0
1984-85*	3,692·8

* Subject to adjustment when audited final claims are received.

The amount which will be paid for 1985-86 will depend in part the council's continuing entitlement to contribution on loan charges already incurred but also on the level of expenditure on grants in 1985-86, which is for the council to decide within the resources available to it.

Council house improvement and maintenance are not specifically grant-aided through the housing subsidy system. These costs are taken into account in the calculation of an authority's entitlement to housing subsidy. But the size of the Exchequer subsidy depends each on a calculation which takes account not only of the total reckonable expenditure incurred by the authority in the provision of council housing, but also the extent to which the authority could reasonably be expected to meet all or part of these costs from local resources.

Docklands STOLport

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce his decision on the proposed STOLport in London docklands as soon as the current legal proceedings have been concluded.

Mr. Macfarlane: Dependent upon the outcome of the legal proceedings, my right hon. Friend will issue his decision as soon as possible thereafter.

Mortgages

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has, in respect of each local authority, and for each year since 1979, regarding (a) the number of mortgages granted, (b) the number of mortgages in respect of which repayments have been rescheduled and (c) the number of cases in which an authority has repossessed a property on which it had advanced a mortgage.

Sir George Young: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Substandard Dwellings

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes have taken place in the number of substandard dwellings in (a) south Yorkshire, (b) west Yorkshire, (c) Humberside and (d) north Yorkshire in the five years up to the latest date for which information is available.

Sir George Young: Local authorities report in their annual housing investment programme returns the numbers of dwellings in their areas which at 1 April were unfit and/or lacking basic amenities. The numbers reported for 1979 and 1984 were as follows:

thousands

	1979	1984
Humberside	33	21
North Yorkshire	23	10
South Yorkshire	75	37
West Yorkshire	119	44
Yorks & Humberside region	250	122

In 1984, Leeds did not include an estimate of the number of its own dwellings which were unfit and Harrogate gave no estimates of sub-standard private housing. In both 1979 and 1984 a few returns did not include estimates of sub-standard housing association or other public sector sub-standard dwellings.

Derelict Land

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes have taken place in the number of acres of derelict land in (a) south Yorkshire, (b) west Yorkshire, (c) Humberside and (d) north Yorkshire in the five years up to the latest date for which information is available.

Mr Macfarlane: Information in the form requested is only available from the derelict land surveys published by my Department. The last, in 1982, also contains details of the previous one in 1974. A copy of the 1982 survey is available in the Library of the House. The information on the areas requested is as follows:

Amount of derelict land (acres)

	1974	1982	Difference 1974-82
Humberside	2,445	2,188	−257
North Yorkshire	96	1,964	1,868
South Yorkshire	3,866	2,742	−1,124
West Yorkshire	7,057	6,521	−536

Rate Capping

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider excluding from rate capping calculations the cost of the design and supervision of land reclamation schemes.

Mr. Waldegrave: It would be open to an authority designated for selective rate limitation to seek a redetermination of the expenditure level proposed for it on these grounds if it so wished. My right hon. Friend would consider any such application carefully.

Home Improvement Policy (Review)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the consultation document his Department has issued on the "Review of Home Improvement Policy", as referred to in section 3.7.23 on page 112 of Cmnd. 9428-II.

Sir George Young: The consultation document on the review of home improvement policy has not yet been published. The reference on page 112 of Cmnd. 9428-II was simply an oversight. I hope that it will be possible to publish the consultation document shortly and I will then gladly arrange for copies to be placed in the Library.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions he has exercised his powers under section 14 of the Interpretation Act 1978 to revoke, amend or re-enact any statutory instrument.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is not readily available in the form requested and cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Local Authority Block Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the total of block grants to be received by each local authority in England in 1985-86, assuming that it spends at the total of its grant related expenditure assessment, after close-ending grant claims to the 1985-86 settlement grant total, but before holdback.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have arranged for this information to be placed in the Library.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total of block grant to be received in 1985-86 by each local authority designated under the Rates Act 1984, assuming that it spends (a) at target, (b) at the total of its grant-related expenditure asessment after the effects of holdback and (c) at its expenditure level after the effects of holdback.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is as follows:

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the total of block grants to be received by each local authority in England in 1985-86, assuming that it spends at the total of its grant-related expenditure assessment after the effects of holdback.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Blackburn on Thursday 7 February 1985 at column 632-33.

Local Authority Finance

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, for each authority designated under the Rates Act 1984, he will specify his judgments and assumptions on (i) expenditure levels for 1985-86, (ii) grant receivable for 1985-86, (iii) transfer to and from special funds and balances during 1985-86, (iv) the appropriate level of balances in hand for 1985-86 and (v) the maximum attainable cuts from reported 1985-86 spending levels, which have formed part of the maximum precepts or proposed maximum rates for those authorities for 1985-86.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have made clear to the authorities concerned that I would be happy to discuss with an individual authority the calculation of the rate or precept limit proposed for them in the context of a proposal from the individual authority for a higher limit. I have no power to redetermine an expenditure level in the absence of an application for a redetermination.

Severe Weather Costs

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether expenditure on snow clearing, gritting and salting will be disregarded for grant penalty purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 15 February 1985, c. 311]: My right hon. Friend is considering the representations to that effect which he has received.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give financial assistance to local authorities, as in previous years, for snow clearing, gritting and salting, where the cost is greater than the product of a 1p rate.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 15 February 1985, c. 311]: My right hon. Friend is considering the representations to that effect which he has received.

Local Authority Charges

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, with reference to the Under-Secretary of State's letter of 11 December 1984 to the local authority associations, (a) how this relates to the review of local authority charges undertaken by his predecessor in 1979-80, (b) what was the outcome of this review and what proposals the Government made and (c) under which legislation such proposals have been given effect.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 29 January 1985, c. 129]: The 1979 review of fees and charges looked at existing charges for local services and recommended that responsibility for a number of minor fees and charges be transferred from central to local government when a suitable legislative opportunity arose. The Government has accepted that recommendation in principle.

However, as I indicated in my letter of 11 December to the local authority associations, the local government finance studies will be looking at the whole issue of local revenue raising in the context of measures to improve the accountability of authorities to their electors, including the possibility of increased use of fees and charges for the beneficial use of services. This goes wider than the original remit of the 1979 review. Nevertheless, we regard the findings of that review as an input to the present studies and will certainly be taking them into account.

Haringey Borough Council (Expenditure)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in calculating the allowable level of 1985-86 expenditure for Haringey borough council, what was the percentage reduction made by his Department from the amount Haringey budgeted to use from internal funds in framing its 1984-85 budget.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 284]: Haringey's treasurer's department worked out that its proposed rate limit took account of the depletion of its reserves in 1984-85, less an amount equal to 5 per cent of its expenditure level. My Department has confirmed in writing that the council's figures represent the basis upon which my right hon. Friend derived the proposed rate limit.

Right to Buy

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many outstanding applications to buy local authority dwellings there were in each local authority area of England on 1 April 1984.

Sir George Young: The following table gives admitted right to buy claims being dealt with at the end of March 1984, as reported by the local authorities. These figures exclude admitted claims which have subsequently been withdrawn or deferred, as well as those where the sales have been completed. Reliable information on the progress of applications to buy under voluntary arrangements is not available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank (Africa Aid)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what impact the decision not to contribute to the Africa fund of the World Bank will have on the ability of the United Kingdom companies to win orders generated by World Bank aid to Africa.

Mr. Raison: We would expect to secure procurement access to the World Bank's special facility for sub-Saharan Africa if we untied the bilateral aid which we have undertaken to earmark for use in support of the facility. This question is still under consideration.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reach a decision about whether to have tied offshore procurement in respect of the £15 million a year earmarked for use in support of the World Bank special facility for sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: A decision will be taken soon.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Public Health and Housing

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local authorities were convicted of offences under the Public Health and Housing Acts in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, relates to all offenders other than individuals, ie companies, local authorities, etc., found guilty at magistrates' courts in England and Wales. In 1983 about 85 such offenders were convicted of offences under Public Health Acts and about 25 under Housing Acts. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Drugs and Alcohol (London)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research is carried out by his Department to establish the extent to which drug addiction or alcohol abuse is a contributory factor to the commission of crime in London.

Mr. Mellor: The Home Office has undertaken or commissioned a number of research studies which examine the relationship between drug misuse and crime in the United Kingdom. Home Office Research Study No. 23 "Delinquency Amongst Opiate Users", published in 1974, described the criminal histories of a group of London opiate users. A study of the criminal behaviour of regular opioid users in London, Cambridge and Bristol has recently been completed.

Research in progress includes a statistical analysis of the criminal convictions of addicts first notified from anywhere in England and Wales between 1979 and 1981, a similar analysis for persons convicted of an offence involving class A notifiable drugs and an examination of some aspects of the relationship between drug misuse and burglary in London and two provincial areas. It is hoped that the findings of these studies will be published during this year. A study in Nottingham of drug misuse and the links with crime is shortly to begin. A review of the findings of these studies, and others, may indicate whether drug misuse contributes more or less to the commission of crime in London as compared with other areas in the United Kingdom.

The result of national and international research on the relationship between crime and alcohol use have been reviewed in articles in the Home Office research and planning unit research bulletin in 1976 and 1983. Copies of the bulletin are in the Library of the House.

Public Witnesses (Statements)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to introduce legislation to allow public witnesses to refer to statements made previously when in the witness box of a trial.

Mr. Mellor: Such legislation is unnecessary since, as the law stands, any witness (whether or not acting in a professional capacity) may, with the leave of the court, refresh his memory by reference to any writing made or verified by himself at a time when the facts were still fresh in his memory.

Greiss Test

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any modifications have been made to the Greiss test since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None has been made.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has commissioned to check the accuracy of the Greiss test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None.

Police (Cautioning Practice)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has issued a circular and guidelines to chief officers of police on cautioning practice, following the circulation of his Department's consultative document "Cautioning by the Police" in June 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The circular and guidelines on police cautioning are being issued to chief officers of police today. Copies are being placed in the Library of the House.

Magistrates' Courts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent the joint Home Office and Lord Chancellor's Department circular HOC 67/1984: LCD JC(84)1, on reducing delay in magistrates' courts has led to reduced delays; whether the national information collection system referred to therein has been introduced; and what has been the outcome of the feasibility study of time tabling arrangements for cases on the day of hearing.

the broadleaves policy review later this month. I cannot anticipate what revised arrangements, if any, might be proposed on the question of the release of farm land for tree planting.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether representatives of his Department have met the Forestry Commission since September 1984 to discuss "Broadleaves in Britain" and its revision of policies for broadleaved woodlands.

Mr. MacGregor: Officials have been in regular contact and a meeting has been arranged for later this month to discuss this matter.

Veterinary Investigation Centres

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the annual budget for each of the veterinary investigation centres each year since 1975.

Mr. Jopling: The information is as follows:

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of people employed, full or part-time, at the veterinary investigation centres at a convenient date each year since 1975.

Mr. Jopling: The numbers of professional, technical and industrial staff in post at the veterinary investigation centres in England and Wales at 1 October were as follows:

	Number
1975	314
1976	337·5
1977	354·5
1978	347·5
1979	339·5
1980	324
1981	317
1982	349
1983	327
1984	337

In addition, an average 75½ support staff provide clerical, typing and cleaning services for the centres.

Support Statistics

Mr. Baldry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total support given by the Exchequer to agriculture and United Kingdom farmers in real terms in the following years: 1955, 1964, 1973, and the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jopling: Expenditure on agricultural support in the United Kingdom under national grant schemes and subsidies and, since 1972-73, under the CAP is as follows in cash and 1983-84 prices.

Financial year	£ million (cash)	£ million (1983-84 prices)*
1955-56	205	1,680
1964-65	264	1,630
1973-74	392	1,420
1983-84	1,728	1,728

* Cash figures adjusted for general inflation as measured by the GDP deflator at market prices.

The figures are taken from the appropriate annual review White Papers and exclude expenditure which may benefit farmers but where the value to them is not shown by the expenditure — for example, expenditure on research, advice and education. They include, however, some expenditure which benefits consumers and trade interests rather than producers. The information is not readily available on a calendar year basis and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether representatives of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department have met the Forestry Commission since September 1984 to discuss "Broadleaves in Britain" and its revision of policies for broadleaved woodlands.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No, but officials of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department and the Forestry Commission are in regular contact on the matter.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Peter Walker: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Coal Stocks

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now give the total coal stocks both distributed and undistributed as of (a) 31 December 1984 and (b) 31 January 1985.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest official figures for coal stocks published in the January edition of "Energy Trends" show total distributed stocks of 16·743 million tonnes and total undistributed stocks of 21·085 million tonnes.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many man hours have been provided by the Metropolitan police in connection with the miners' dispute;

(2) how many man hours have been provided by the Metropolitan police since 14 March to deal with racial harassment problems.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 14 March 1984 and 9 February 1985 aid provided by the Metropolitan police to other police forces in connection with the miners' dispute has amounted to some 213,000 man-days. Information about the number of man-hours worked is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

No central record is maintained by the Metropolitan police of the time spent by officers on each of the many tasks they may be called upon to perform in the course of normal divisional duties in the Metropolitan police district.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Brittan: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action of women in the Civil Service.

Multi-occupied Houses (Fire Safety)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the delay in drawing up a national code of practice covering means of escape in case of fire from houses in multiple occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the subject of means of escape in case of fire from houses in multi-occupation in the Liverpool area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Members to the reply, I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 14 February at column 235.

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will seek the renewal of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: A draft order was laid on 12 February under section 14(10) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. If the draft order is approved by Parliament, the Act will continue in force for a further 12 months. I shall receive Sir Cyril Philips' first report on the operation of the Act very shortly; his report and my response to it will be made public before the draft order is debated.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Tigré

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present level of British aid to the Tigré area of Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: The relief aid we are providing to help victims of the famine in Ethiopia is not specifically directed to particular provinces, but is intended to help those in need wherever they may be.

Ethiopia

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek a report from the Secretary General of the United Nations as to the present situation in Ethiopia, including allegations that food relief has been abused, and is not reaching all parts of Ethiopia, that people are being forcibly resettled and that money donated to relief agencies has been misappropriated; and if he will make a statement.

retained for defence use. Th Ministry of Defence use of Sealand will be reviewed when decisions about the development of the Dee estuary have been taken.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what decision has been taken concerning the future of the site at Maidstone (Sandling Wood), Kent following the recommendations of the Nugent report on defence lands.

Mr. Lee: The Sandling Wood site was declared surplus to defence requirements and subsequently sold in January 1981.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any land has been made available for disposal at the Royal Air Force station at Andover, Hampshire following the recommendations of the Nugent committee report on defence lands.

Mr. Lee: Approximately 230 acres of land at the former RAF Andover have been disposed of since the report of the defence lands committee.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the recommendations of the Nugent committee on defence lands have been fully carried out with respect to Llansilin, Shropshire and Driffield, Yorkshire.

Mr. Lee: Both sites are being used for defence purposes. It has been possible, however, to dispose of 90 acres of the Driffield site.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence why only 24 acres of the land held at West Rayham, Norfolk, have been released of the 111 acres so recommended by the Nugent committee report on defence lands.

Mr. Lee: There is a continuing defence requirement for the remaining 87 acres.

US National Guardsmen

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers of United States national guardsmen who have been on exercise in the United Kingdom in 1984 and in 1985 to date.

Mr. Stanley: Eight hundred and forty in 1984. None so far in 1985.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any plans for United States national guardsmen to visit the United Kingdom to take part in exercises at any time in 1985.

Mr. Stanley: It is envisaged that United States national guardsmen will participate in exercises in the United Kingdom in 1985 but no firm plans have as yet been made.

Reforger Exercises

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the United States Army units training in Britain during the recent Reforger exercises; and whether those units have been trained in the airland battle doctrine.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

HMS Splendid and Spartan

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 17 January, Official Report, column 189, when the hon. Member for Linlithgow can expect to receive a letter from the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on HMS Splendid and HMS Spartan.

Mr. Heseltine: I have written to the hon. Member today.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Doctors (Dispensing)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many general practitioner partnerships also dispense medicines; what is the average income from National Health Service prescriptions received by such partnerships; and what estimate he has made of the financial consequences for such partnerships of the implementation of his original proposals for a limited list of drugs available under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Central data are not readily available in the form requested. However, at 1 October 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 2,948 dispensing doctors in England, 209 of whom were not working in partnership. The average gross income from dispensing—excluding the cost of drugs—for all dispensing doctors was £6,041. In addition, some dispensing doctors receive an income from the discounts offered by manufacturers. The limited list proposals may reduce the average gross income from NHS dispensing if it reduces the total number of NHS prescriptions dispensed. We are still considering whether to allow dispensing doctors to prescribe privately to NHS patients medicines which will no longer be available on the NHS.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the total income received by general practices in the United Kingdom from the dispensing of National Health Service prescriptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Anti-progesterone Pills

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many doctors have applied to the Committee on Safety of Medicines for permission to conduct clinical trials of anti-progesterone pills on women; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many doctors have applied to the Committee on Safety of Medicines for permission to conduct clinical trials of the French anti-progesterone pill, known as RU 486, on women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All information provided to the licensing authority in support of applications made or exemptions applied for under the Medicines Act 1968 is treated as commercially confidential as it could be of financial value to the competitors of the applicant.

Any clinical trials of RU 486, or any other similar product, as an abortifacient must, of course, comply with the requirements of the relevant Abortion Acts.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what factors led him to change his policy of opposition to a limited list of prescribable drugs as stated on 22 November 1983, Official Report, column 112.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My reply of 22 November 1983 at column 114 was about a limited list of drugs across all therapeutic categories. We had accepted the recommendation of the Greenfield committee on effective prescribing that a limited list of this kind should not be introduced because there was not at that time any convincing evidence that the potential financial benefits would outweigh the administrative problems in drawing up and maintaining one. Our present proposals cover only a small number of therapeutic categories and are the result of further detailed investigations and inquiries which show that savings would be both immediate and worth while with no damage to patient care.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that there will be an adequate period of adjustment for manufacturers between the announcement of his final limited list proposals and their entry into force.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Manufacturers have known of the provisional list since November. The revised list will be announced shortly, coming into effect on 1 April.

Doctors (Incomes)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 11 February, Official Report, column 72, on what basis information relating to the income derived by individual doctors or practices from dispensing National Health Service prescriptions is confidential; if he will make it his policy to publish such information with the consent of the individuals or practices concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: General medical practioners are independent contractors to the National Health Service. Our policy has always been that no information about individuals or practices incomes will be made available without their consent. Perhaps my hon. Friend could seek this information from the practice concerned.

Spastics Society (Correspondence)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the letter sent to him on 22 January by Sir John Cox, of the Spastics Society, and others about the special programme funding of social services, together with his reply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: Yes. I shall be replying to Sir John shortly.

Tendering

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for the savings achieved in relation to the eight contracted-out services referred to in his Department's press release 84/50 on health service tendering.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 55]: I have received the following up-to-date information on the eight contracts which replaces that in my reply of 23 July 1984:

District	Annual savings £
Leeds Western	* 30,000
East Surrey	*157,000
Maidstone	*140,000
Medway	†357,000
Bromley	‡ 53,000
Merton and Sutton	‡126,000
North Warwickshire	‡ 70,000
North-West Surrey	‡ 50,000

* These are all new services. The savings figures are derived from comparison with in-house bids.

† Some work is being undertaken by a contractor and some by the in-house organisation. The total savings are derived from a comparison with previous estimated costs.

‡ The savings are derived from comparison with previous estimated costs.

I apologise that some of the previous information was incorrect, but it was based on the best information available to us at the time. The hon. Member will note that these eight examples between them are providing annual savings of £983,000 a year.

AIDS

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if his Department will issue urgent guidelines to all National Health Service staff involved in treating patients suffering from or suspected to be suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement;

(2) What representations his Department has received concerning guidance to National Health Service workers in contact with patients suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 279]: Interim guidelines on AIDS, drawn up the advisory committee on dangerous pathogens, were published jointly by Health Ministers and the Health and Safety Commission on 16 January. Health authorities were told about these guidelines in circular HC(85)2. This asked them to comply with the recommendations as soon as practicable and to bring them to the attention of staff. The guidelines set out the measures to be taken to safeguard the health and safety of people who, because of their work, come into direct contact with AIDS patients or specimens from them. We have received no representations concerning the guidelines.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether representatives of the Forestry Commission and officials from his Department have met since September 1984 to discuss the revision of arrangements for the release of lowland agriculture land for forestry or woodland planting; and whether any revised arrangements are proposed under the "Broadleaves in Britain Review".

Mr. MacGregor: Officials of the two Departments have been in regular contact and will be meeting to discuss spends directly and indirectly on research ino (a) acquired immune deficiency syndrome, (b) cancer and (c) the common cold.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council (MRC), which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. As to expenditure on AIDS, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 26 November at column 389. In the financial year 1983-84, I understand that the council spent approximately £11 million on cancer research projects, with the Health Departments contributing a further £5·8 million. A number of areas of enquiry are relevant to the common cold, including viral infections, influenza and diseases of the upper respiratory tract. The MRC's on projects in these areas totalled £1·55 million in 1983-84.

Research into these problems is also being conducted in universities and medical schools. Much of this is financed from the block grant allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee.

Shoggs Head Infant School, Barnsley

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received an objection from the parents' action group to the closure of Shoggs Head infant school by the Metropolitan borought council of Barnsley.

Mr. Dunn: One statutory objection, representing 11 signatures, has been received to the proposed closure of Shroggs Head infant school. There is no indication from the objection as to whether the signatures represent a parents' action group.

Unemployed School Leavers

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the school educational attainment of unemployed school leavers.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have been asked to reply.

Provisional results of the 1983 labour force survey indicate that in Great Britain in the second quarter of 1983 there were about 490,000 unemployed people aged 16 or over who had never had a job since leaving full-time education. Analysis by highest qualification indicates that about 50 per cent. of these had no qualifications; 18 per cent. had CSE (below grade 1) or equivalent, 23 per cent had 'O' levels or equivalent and 10 per cent. had 'A' levels or equivalent or higher.

CIVIL SERVICE

Decision-taking (Delegated Responsibility)

41. Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he is satisfied with the level of delegation of decision-taking within the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am fully convinced of the need for greater delegation so that more decisions are taken by managers with clear objectives, the authority they need to make best use of their resources, and the means to account for whay they achieve.

ENERGY

Government Purchasing Policy

1. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what measures will be taken by his Department following the conclusions of the report on Government purchasing.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department is drawing up an action plan which I expect to see in March.

Electricity Generation

20. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of electricity generated by the Central Electricity Generating Board in 1984 was from coal on a fuel used basis; and what was the comparative figure for 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: Figures for the full calendar year will not be available until later this month. However, in the period January to November, on a fuel used basis, 55 per cent. of the electricity produced by the Central Electricity Board was derived from coal compared with 82 per cent. in the equivalent period in 1983.

Coal Industry Dispute

21. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the coalmining industry.

23. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the present coalmining dispute.

28. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the mining strike.

29. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the strike in the mining industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley).

26. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the strike in the coal industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have frequent meetings with the chairman of the National Coal Board. I would refer the hon. Member to my earlier reply today to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley).

Opencast Mining

22. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will implement the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's recommendation that the statutory limit on individual opencast licences should be raised from 25,000 tonnes to 100,000 tonnes.

Mr. David Hunt: I shall be reviewing the MMC's recommendation in the context of coal policy generally when the present dispute in the industry has been settled.

Nuclear Material

24. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what levels of nuclear fuel stocks are available at power stations; and what volume of nuclear waste is awaiting removal from nuclear power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Nuclear power stations normally hold stocks of fresh fuel sufficient for refuelling power stations several months ahead. Normally irradiated fuel is held for a minimum of 90 days at nuclear power stations prior to removal to Sellafield.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the full range of activities his Department undertakes in order to fulfil any obligations it discharges with regard to (a) nuclear materials accountancy and (b) nuclear materials safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad: The Department of Energy safeguards office has responsibility for ensuring that operators of United Kingdom nuclear facilities undertake nuclear material accountancy and other safeguards activities required by United Kingdom and community legislation are fulfilled. It also has a safeguards co-ordinating, control and advisory function and all routine declarations made by United Kingdom facilities to Euratom pass through the safeguards office.

Electricity Generation (Oil Burn)

25. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy what tonnage of oil has been burned in the electricity supply industry during the current miners' dispute; how this compares with the corresponding period 12 months previously; and if he will give the costs in each case.

Mr. Goodlad: Figures for fuel used in the generation of electricity appear in Energy Trends, which is published monthly. Information on the cost involved is a matter for the industry.

Sizewell Inquiry

27. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to receive the inspector's report from the Sizewell inquiry.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the inquiry is expected to finish shortly. The length of the report writing period thereafter is a matter for the inspector.

Electricity Consumption

30. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last compiled information on the consumption of electricity broken down by area boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Information on electricity sales by area boards is published in the boards' annual reports and the Electricity Council's statements of accounts and statistics, copies of which are in the Library of the House. In addition I regularly receive details of electricity sales from the electricity supply industry.

Nuclear Burst (Damage)

31. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Energy what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a general issue which is being considered interdepartmentally.

Coal-firing Scheme

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will amend his Department's rules of guidance to extend the provisions of the coal-firing scheme to local authorities and health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The coal firing scheme is operated under section 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982, which provides powers for the government to extend selective assistance for purposes connected with the development of industry. The rules governing the scheme need to be consistent with these powers.

Departmental Adminstration

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the total cost of adminstration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Walker: The gross figures are:

Year	£ million (1983-84 prices)
1979-80	33·1
1980-81	31·7
1981-82	29·5
1982-83	27·8
1983-84	26·6

The figures in the table show that my Department reduced its gross running costs by around 20 per cent. in real terms over the five years.

Oil-related Construction and Fabrication Industry

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current level of domestic activity within the United Kingdom onshore oil-related construction and fabrication industry.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Many United Kingdom fabrication companies now have substantial orders. In just over a year British companies have won some £700 million of fabrication work.

Enhanced Oil Recovery

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he proposes to ensure that enhanced oil recovery is pursued in offshore fields; and if he will introduce regulations and inducements to facilitate such development.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Government have under review the possibilities for additional measures to encourage enhanced oil recovery in accordance with their policy of achieving maximum economic recovery of petroleum from the United Kingdom continental shelf. The Government have an extensive research and development programme, conducted in collaboration with the industry, to help establish and assess the economic effectiveness of the technology in North sea conditions.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy which nuclear power stations were shut down or operated at substantially reduced capacity for purposes of inspection over the last three months of 1984 and in the same period in 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: The following nuclear power stations operated by the Central Electricity Generating Board were shut down or operated at substantially reduced capacity for the purposes of inspection in accordance with the requirements of their nuclear site licences during the whole or part of the last three months of 1983 or 1984.

Electricity Boards

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will define the financial framework within which electricity boards operate.

Mr. Goodlad: The financial framework within which the electricity supply industry operates has been defined on a number of occasions. In particular, I refer the hon. Member to the memorandum submitted by the Department of Energy and the Treasury to the Energy Committee in January 1984 (House of Commons Report 276, volume 2, pages 2 and 3).

Since then, my right hon. Friend has agreed with the industry and announced a new financial target and performance aim over the next three years, as stated in Official Report, 19 December, at column 164. The external financing limit for the industry in the coming year (−£1,128 million), consistent with the financial target and performance aim, was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Autumn Statement of 12 November 1984.

Sellafield and Springfields (Safeguards)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) when his Department made proposals to the European Atomic Energy Authority over the implementation of safeguards at the mixed civil-military nuclear plant at Sellafield and Springfields.

(2) whether his Department has received any communications or representations from (a) the European Economic Community Energy Commission, (b) the Director General (Energy) of section DG-17 at the European Commission and (c) the Director of Euratom Safeguards Directorate on the matter of the prohibition of Euratom inspectors at Sellafield and Springfields works; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Proposals with respect to both BNF Sellafield and Springfields were put to the Commission in 1981 and 1982 respectively, and are now being discussed between the United Kingdom and the Commission.

SCOTLAND

Handicapped Persons (Care Facilities)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many day-care centres there are in Lothian and Edinburgh for the severely handicapped over 16 years of age; and what information he has as to (a) how many vacant places there are for 1984-85, (b) where those vacancies exist, (c) if there is a waiting list and (d) how these figures compare with the 1980 figures and each year since 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: Information is only available centrally up to 31 March 1984 and does not extend to unoccupied places or waiting lists. The figures for the years 1980 to 1984 are as follows:

*Adult Training Centres/Day Care Centres for the Handicapped

Year Ended 31 March	Lothian (excluding Edinburgh)	Edinburgh
1980	8	12
1981	8	11
1982	8	12
1983	8	12
1984	8	13

* Includes centres provided by voluntary agencies.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what facilities there are for respite care for the over 16-year-old severely handicapped attending day centres in Lothian and Edinburgh for 1984-85; and how these figures compare with those in 1980 and in each year since 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: The only information held centrally about forms of respite care relates to the full-time care of disabled people in residential homes for handicapped persons provided by the local authority and voluntary agencies. Information beyond 31 March 1984 is not yet available. The available figures are as follows:

Number of Residential Homes

Year Ended 31 March	Lothian (excluding Edinburgh)	Edinburgh
1980	4	10
1981	4	11
1982	4	12
1983	4	11
1984	4	12

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from general practitioners in rural areas who prescribe and dispense drugs regarding the proposals to ban prescriptions to National Health Service patients of brand-name products which will be excluded from the Government's limited list scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: We have received some 350 representations from doctors commenting on our proposals to limit the range of drugs available in certain therapeutic categories. Some of these letters have come from general medical practitioners in rural areas but it would not be possible to identify those who are dispensing doctors without disproportionate cost.

Salmon

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland on Monday 11 February, what steps he will take to seek to restore the levels of the Scottish catch of salmon to the levels attained in the 1960s and early 1970s.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 24 January and 15 February at column 517-18 and 312.

"Broadleaves in Britain"

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) why the Forestry Commission has held private discussions about it revisions of the "Broadleaves in Britain" review since September 1984 with non-governmental organisations representing farming, landowning and timber-growing interests;

(2) why the Forestry Commission has not held discussions since September 1984 with non-governmental organisations representing conservation interests about its revisions of the "Broadleaves in Britain" review.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission is at present drawing up draft policy proposals for broadleaved woodlands for discussion at a seminar to be held in May, to which 27 organisations, representing a balanced cross-section of interests, have now been invited.

In the course of developing these proposals, the commission has had the benefit of the many comments it received in response to its consultative paper "Broadleaves in Britain"; it has also had meetings to discuss certain ideas with the Nature Conservancy Council, the Countryside Commission and the Countryside Commission for Scotland, covering the environment interest, and with some non-Government bodies whose interests were not covered by those agencies. The Forestry Commission will also be consulting other Government Departments before putting the draft policy proposals to the seminar.

Regional Fire Advisers

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list, for each civil defence region, the name, present employment, date appointed and terms of reference of the regional fire adviser for each year from 1979 to 1985;

(2) if he will list, for each regional fire adviser from 1979 to 1985 (i) the meetings attended in person or in deputy at which any representative of his Department acting in an official capacity was also present and (ii) the topics discussed at each meeting;

(3) if any employer has refused to allow any employee to become a regional fire adviser;

(4) what are the means by which the consent of an employer is obtained to the appointment of a regional fire adviser.

Mr. Ancram: In Scotland regional fire advisers are described as zone fire commanders (designate). Until 1982 the country was divided into three zones for home defence purposes and, subsequently, into two zones. The table shows the appointments over the years 1979 to 1985; the post in South zone is currently vacant. There are no formal terms of reference but a zone fire commander (designate) is responsible for the co-ordination of emergency fire service planning in his zone. Meetings attended by representatives of the Scottish Home and Health Department and involving zone fire commanders (designate) in this capacity (their names are shown in brackets) took place on the following dates:

18 May 1979 (Mr. Knowlton);
11 December 1979 (Mr. Jones);
13 April 1982 (Mr. Knowlton);
27 October 1982 (Mr. Nicoll);
27 January 1983 (Mr. Knowlton and Mr. Nicoll);
13 April 1983 (Mr. Knowlton and Mr. Nicoll);
13 October 1983 (Mr. Nicoll);
12 January 1984 (Mr. Knowlton and Mr. Nicoll);
3 May 1984 (Mr. Knowlton);
14 November 1984 (Mr. Nicoll).

The topics discussed at these meetings related to war emergency planning for the fire service.

The consent of an employing authority to its firemaster being appointed as zone fire commander (designate) is obtained by correspondence between the Scottish Home and Health Department and the authority and has in no case been refused.

Forestry Commission (Aerial Spraying)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the sites which constitute the 3,727 hectares of land which were aerially sprayed with pesticides by the Forestry Commission in 1984, giving in each case the area, the pesticide used and the target pest species.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Location: Conservancy	Forest District	Area (hectares)	Pesticide	Target Species
South Wales	Afan	66	Glyphosphate	Grasses
South Wales	Afan	33	Asulam	Bracken
South Wales	Brecon	28	Glyhosphate	Grasses
South Wales	Brecon	36	Asulam	Bracken
North Scotland	Dornoch	2,167	Virox	Pine Sawfly
East Scotland	Fife	1,100	Diflubenzuron (Dimilin)	Pine Looper Moth
East Scotland	Speymouth	142	Fenitrothion	Control experiment directed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under the auspices of the Pesticide Safety Precautions scheme to evaluate any effects on woodland birds.
South Scotland	Aberfoyle	155	Asulam	Bracken
		3,727

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total cost to the Forestry Commission of the 3,727 hectares of aerial pesticide spraying which it carried out on its estate in 1984; and what proportion of the work was carried out by private contractors.

Mr. John MacKay: The total cost to the Forestry Commission was approximately £70,000. All the aerial spraying was undertaken by private contractors.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those articles of the United Nations convention on the law of the sea which Her Majesty's Government consider as having achieved the status of customary international law.

Mr. Rifkind: Customary international law is based on state practice. In order to prepare the list requested, it would be necessary to examine each point in detail to assess how far the specific provisions in the text of the convention reflected state practice. That would not be practicable.

Mr. Adam Fergusson

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the reply by his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Official Report, 11 February, column 30, why it is necessary for Mr. Adam Fergusson, in his capacity as special adviser on European Community Affairs, to maintain contact with the European Assembly on non-Community issues; and if he will specify the non-Community issues involved.

Mr. Rifkind: The non-Community issues referred to in my reply on 11 February at column 30 include those dealt with by the Ten (eg political co-operation) in which the European Parliament has an interest. These are matters of importance to this country and it is right that our views should be fully taken into account in the European Parliament.

British Nuclear Fuels plc

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the division in responsibility between his Department and British Nuclear Fuels plc, with regard to the storage, export and accountancy of plutonium.

Mr. Luce: Before an export licence is issued, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is responsible for obtaining appropriate assurances from the Government of a receiving state regarding peaceful and non-explosive use, application of International Atomic Energy Authority safeguards, standards of physical protection and conditions for retransfer. British Nuclear Fuels Plc is responsible to the Department of Energy for the storage and accountancy of all safeguarded material in its possession.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Sitting Hours

Mr. Chope asked the Lord Privy Seal on how many days in each of the last 10 parliamentary Sessions the House has sat beyond midnight; and what was the proportion of total sitting days in each Session thereby represented.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

Session	(a) Total sitting days*	(b) Days on which the House sat after 12 midnight	(b) as a percentage of (a)
1974-75	198	94	47·47

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Community

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the trading advantages of United Kingdom membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Butcher: The European Community gives United Kingdom producers the opportunity of trading in a permanently assured internal market of 270 million people, allowing the fuller exploitation of economies of scale and giving a greater competitive stimulus to higher productivity and efficiency.

Second-hand Cars (Consumer Protection)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation bringing second–hand car dealers within the scope of consumer protection laws in the same manner as in Scotland.

Mr. Butcher: The Government have no current plans to introduce legislation on the lines of the provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 allowing local authorities in Scotland to license dealers in second hand goods, including used cars.

EEC (Heads of Government Agreement)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to implement the Community Heads of Government agreement of December 1982 that a priority goal should be to strengthen the Common Market and intensify action to eliminate practices and measures which restrict trade and distort competition.

Mr. Channon: The European Council in December 1982 requested the Council of Ministers to decide on a series of priority measures proposed by the Commission to strengthen the internal market by reducing technical barriers to trade and frontier formalities. Nearly all the measures proposed have now been adopted and most are already in operation.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Butcher: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Trade Marks (Amendment) Act 1984

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to use his power under section 2(2) of the Trade Marks (Amendment) Act 1984 to make an order providing for implementation of the provisions of the Act before 1 October 1987.

Mr. Butcher: The date of 1 October 1987 for the implementation of this Act (which provides for registration of service marks) was set in order to give the Trade Marks Registry time to reduce its existing backlog so that the orderly working of the system would not be jeopardised by its extension to cover service marks. I am very pleased to say that despite increasing numbers of applications, the substantially improved productivity of the registry means that we are now aiming to implement the Act one year early.

Industry (Bank Loans)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations his Department has received in connection with the availability of long-term bank loans to British industry.

Mr. Butcher: My Department has not received any recent representations on the availability of long-term bank loans to British industry.

Pirate Radio

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of the recent action taken against pirate radio stations.

Mr. Butcher: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 7 February 1985 in column 665 of the Official Report.

Imports and Exports (Middle East)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will set out in tabular form for 1984 the value of United Kingdom exports to and imports from Iraq, the United Arab Emirates, Jordan and Israel, respectively.

Mr. Butcher: The provisional information for 1984 is as follows:

Value £ millions

	United Kingdom Exports (fob)	United Kingdom Imports (cif)
Iraq	343	69
United Arab Emirates	542	87
Jordan	193	18
Israel	393	393

Source: Table 1B of the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.
Note: The United Arab Emirates comprise Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, Ras al Khaimah, Ajman, Umm al Qaiwain, and Fujairah.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will set out in tabular form for each of the calendar years 1980 to 1984 inclusive the value of United Kingdom exports to and imports from Syria and Iran, respectively.

Mr. Butcher: Following is the information:

Value £ millions

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984*
Syria
United Kingdom Exports (fob)	82	85	89	72	92

Ferrous Scrap

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what results have been achieved through representations made to the EEC Commission and to the Italian Industry Minister concerning the Italian Government's decision to subsidise imported ferrous scrap.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Support for Innovation Programme (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that industrialists in Yorkshire and Humberside region are sufficiently aware of the availability of grants under the support for innovation programme.

Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what percentage of the total amount of money paid in grants under the support for innovation programme has been received in Yorkshire and Humberside region;

(2) if he will give preferential rates of grant in assisted areas to promote high technology development under the support for innovation programme.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Members as soon as possible.

Tourist Industry

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make special assistance available to compensate for the reduced availability of European Community grants for the tourist industry consequent upon the loss of assisted area status.

Mr. Butcher: Special assistance for the tourist industry is already available throughout Britain under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. The funds for this scheme in England were increased following its extension from the assisted areas in August 1982.

Local authority tourism projects in the assisted areas continue to be eligible for support from the European regional development fund. The Government have encouraged areas which lost Assisted Area status in the changes announced on 28 November 1984 to take advantage of the special transitional arrangement which it secured on their behalf with the European Commission, enabling applications to be submitted to the Commission by 31 March 1985 provided that the bulk of expenditure on those projects will be incurred by 30 November 1985.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will broaden the definition of regional assisted areas eligible for European Economic Community tourism assistance to include both rural development areas and the textile industry and coal and steel industry restructuring areas.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Regional Assistance (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the total planned reduction of £300 million in the cost of regional assistance is expected to occur in the Yorkshire and Humberside region.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Retail Grocery Trade

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the six largest retail grocery chains by turnover; and what is the share of the total grocery trade in the United Kingdom commanded by them in 1970, 1980 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Butcher: Statistics on the retail grocery trade are regularly collected by the Business Statistics Office and agregates from these inquiries which do not disclose information about individual businesses are available to me along with data from other sources. Official published figures for the totals of the five largest contributions by enterprise groups show that these accounted for 31 per cent. of retail sales of groceries and provisions in Great Britain in 1980 and 33 per cent. in 1982. Comparable figures for 1970 are not available. (Estimates for the largest six enterprise groups cannot be provided without disclosing information for an individual business.) Some information based on independent surveys of the retail grocery trade is published in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission reports on discounts to retailers (HC 311, 1981) and The Dee Corporation plc and Booker McConnell plc (Cmnd. 9429, 1985).

Information Technology

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the value of the output of the whole information technology industry in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984;

(2) what was the percentage of import penetration in the United Kingdom in information technology in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984;

(3) what was the rate of growth of the United Kingdom information technology industry in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Butcher: Using the definition of information technology specified, data is given for 1979-1983 and for January-September 1984, the full-year figures not yet being available.

	Output at current prices £ million*	Growth year-on-year Percentage	Import penetration Percentage
1984 (January-September)	6,809	—	65
1983	7,635	18	63
1982	6,496	10	59
1981	5,905	6	53
1980	5,582	17	48
1979	4,753	17	51

Office machinery (activity heading 3301 in Standard Industrial Classification, revised 1980), electronic data processing equipment (3302), telecommunications equipment (3341), radio and electronic capital goods (3443), electronic components and subassemblies (3444 and 3453), and electronic consumer goods (3454).

* Sales of principal products of listed industries by all United Kingdom manufacturing firms.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the United Kingdom's balance of trade in information technology in 1984.

Mr. Butcher: Figures for the balance of trade in 1984 for the information technology industries (defined below) are not yet available; there was, however, a deficit of £1,792 million in the first three quarters of the year.

Office machinery (activity heading 3301 in Standard Industrial Classification, revised 1980), electronic data processing equipment (3302), telecommunications equipment (3341), radio and electronic capital goods (3443), electronic components and subassemblies (3444 and 3453), and electronic consumer goods (3454).

Microchips

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the size of the European market for microchips in 1984; and if he will estimate the percentage of that market supplied by (a) United Kingdom producers, (b) other European producers, (c) Japan and (d) the United States of America.

Mr. Butcher: The 1984 European market for semiconductor devices is estimated at around $4·7 billion. About 35 per cent. of this market was met by the European production and of this the United Kingdom contributed 10 per cent. The remainder came from Japanese (10 per cent.) and United States (55 per cent.) sources.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much of the United Kingdom market for microchips was supplied by domestic production in 1984.

Mr. Butcher: Figures for the whole of 1984 are not available. For the first three quarters of the year domestic suppliers provided 35 per cent. by value of the estimated home market.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward proposals to make breaches of the code of practice for citizens band radio users subject to criminal sanctions.

Mr. Butcher: We have no plans to do so. The CB code of practice gives generalised advice on matters such as operating practice and safety and was not designed to be legally enforceable.

Manufacturing Industry (Investment)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the amount of investment in manufacturing industry on an annual basis for the years 1975 to 1980 and 1980 to the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Butcher: The required information is given in the following table:

Investment in manufacturing industry (£ million at 1980 prices)

Year	Total capital expenditure £ million*
1975	7,084
1976	6,743
1977	7,213
1978	7,877
1979	8,205
1980	7,307
1981	5,693
1982	5,596
1983	5,433
1984	†6,111

* Direct capital expenditure plus assets leased from the financial industries.

† Fourth quarter estimated.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department is doing to protect MPT 1320 citizens band radio users on 27 mhz FM in Southampton against the use of foul language, music broadcasting and other interference on the mobile users' channel, the calling channel and the emergency channel.

Mr. Butcher: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the misuse of citizens band radio. My Department is currently reviewing the work of the radio investigation service with a view to increasing the effectiveness of its law enforcement activities. As part of this effort we are planning a series of campaigns in selected areas against licence abuse and also licence evasion. Citizens band will be one of the first services to be tackled, though I cannot, of course, say where these campaigns will be particularly concentrated.

TRANSPORT

Ports (Road Links)

32. Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the motorway and road network links with small and medium ports; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I receive representations from time to time about road links to particular ports. Most ports have adequate road access. Where a better road is needed, improvements are in preparation or under consideration by ourselves or the local highway authority, as appropriate. any decision to provide a motorway-standard improvement would depend on several factors including the general quality of the existing routes.

Scottish Lowlands Airport Policy

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to publish the report of the review of Scottish lowlands airport policy.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are still considering the report of the inter-departmental working group which carried out this review.

London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how he calculated the sum of £258,179,588 specified in the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill;

(2) what items that the Greater London Council was charged for under the order arising from section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984, will not be included in calculating the sum specified in the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. Ridley: I refer the hon. Member to the full explanation I gave the House during the debate on the Ways and Means Resolution on 7 February.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he expects the implementation of the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill to create a surplus for London Regional Transport during the financial year 1984-85.

Mr. Ridley: The amount specified in the bill will not be more than sufficient to provide LRT with reserves to meet its 1984-85 leasing commitments and other liabilities accruing at the end of the year.

Driving Tests

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect the number of cancellations of driving tests due to recent adverse weather conditions has had upon the length of time waited by driving test applicants before receiving their test; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Nationally 73,660 test appointments were cancelled due to adverse weather between 2 January and 8 February (the latest date for which figures are available). This could add about two weeks to the national average waiting time. The Department is making every effort to provide new appointments for the candidates concerned before the normal forward booking date. Many have already been accommodated.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current cost to public funds of each driving test; and how such costs are computed.

Mrs. Chalker: Income from fees for each driving test is intended to cover all costs falling on public funds over the period for which the fee is prescribed (which does not necessarily relate to any one financial year). Calculations include the direct salary costs of driving examiners (with national insurance and superannuation liabilities), immediate overheads of the driving test organisation such as training, test bookings, accommodation costs and administration, together with a contribution to central departmental on-costs such as payroll and personnel management.

The figures for the last full financial year (1983-84) are:

	£ million
Type of Test	Income	Cost
L-test	26·3	24·3
HGV driver test	2·2	1·8
PSV driver test	0·3	0·3
Part I motorcycle test	0·2	0·5

Income represents cash received net of refunds, and is inclusive of notional interest credits where significant waiting periods occur between payment of the fee and the test. (The national average waiting period for L-tests increased by 3 to 13 weeks during 1983-84.)

Driving Test Examiners

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied that the number of driving test examiners currently serving the Huddersfield area is sufficient to maintain a prompt public service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The complement at Huddersfield driving test centre is one senior driving examiner and four examiners. Currently the centre is operating with one senior and three examiners, but a forth examiner is due to be posted there on 25 March. This level of staff should be adequate to meet the demand for tests in the area but the situation will be kept under review.

Heavy Lorries (Water Spray)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if the Institute of Road Transport Engineers was consulted by his Department before new regulations were issued to control water spray from heavy goods vehicles;

(2) which interested bodies his Department consulted before issuing new regulations to control water spray from heavy goods vehicles;

(3) what period of time was taken up in consulting interested bodies before he issued new regulations in respect of the control of water spray from heavy goods vehicles;

(4) how many alternative anti-spray devices were evaluated by his Department prior to the issuing of new regulations to control water spray from heavy goods vehicles.

Mrs. Chalker: Twenty different configurations of practical anti-spray devices were evaluated by Southampton university, under contract to the Department, and further tests were made on at least seven manufacturers' products. The result of this work were embodied in British Standard BS AU 200 which was the subject of wide consultation by the BSI.

Draft regulations applying this standard were issued on 2 March 1984 inviting comments from a great many organisations. Those who responded with substantial comments, including the IRTE, are as follows and regulations were laid before Parliament on 10 October 1984.

Tanker Havens

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport what facilities will be given to hon. Members to consult the data bank of the marine, amenity and environmental factors of coastal areas considered suitable for the emergency transfer of oil from damaged tankers which he announced on 4 February, Official Report, column 438.

Mr. David Mitchell: When it is completed, I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

A642

Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for relieving the traffic burden on the A642.

Mrs. Chalker: The published proposals for the Kirkhamgate-Dishforth scheme include a link from the M1 to the A1 which would, amongst other things, relieve the A642 of much of its existing traffic. My right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Transport and the Environment, hope to announce a decision on these proposals during the early part of this year.

A1 (M)

Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking towards upgrading the A1(M) between Aberford and Wetherby.

Mrs. Chalker: The published proposals for the Kirkhamgate-Dishforth scheme include improvement of the A1 from its junction with the A64 northwards to a new bypass of Wetherby. My right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Transport and the Environment, hope to announce a decision on these proposals during the early part of this year.

The capacity of the A1 to the south of the junction with the A64 is being kept under regular review.

National Bus Company (Subsidy)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current level of subsidy from Her Majesty's Government to the National Bus Company; and what information he has as to the level of subsidy to bus companies in (a) France, (b) West Germany, (c) Sweden and (d) Spain, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: In 1983 central Government subsidy to the National Bus Company was £41·8 million or 6 per cent. of the company's gross revenue. Total subsidy was 15 per cent. of gross revenue.

The latest information we have on total subsidy for bus services by country is as follows:

Subsidy as a percentage of revenue

	Percentage	Year
Great Britain	28	1982
France	57	1981
West Germany	38	1982
Sweden	56	1980
Spain	13	1976

All figures for total subsidy exclude payments to operators in respect of concessionary fares.

Public Transport Facilities (Grants)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the guidelines for the grants under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968.

Mrs. Chalker: Draft guidance to local authorities on the criteria that will apply to section 56 grants for public transport will be issued for consultation with local authority associations in the near future.

Moore Lane Bus Station, Bolton

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will be making a decision about the application for a grant for refurbishment of Moore Lane bus station in Bolton; if this will qualify for assistance under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: A decision on whether Moore Lane bus station in Bolton will qualify for a section 56 grant will be made in the light of the criteria applying to such grants, as soon as they have been established.

Green Belt (Motorway Interchange)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will allow the purchase of land owned by his Department at the M25/M1/A405 interchange, by St. Stephen's parish council, for the purpose of its continuance as green belt.

Mrs. Chalker: We have had a number of offers to purchase this land. Its use is a matter in the first instance for the local planning authority. Consistent with a decision on that use, it is Government policy to obtain the best possible price for assets disposed of.

Emery Airfreight

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will explain the reasons why the weekly air cargo service between New York and Manchester, operated on behalf of Emery Airfreight, is no longer allowed to operate.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No application to operate cargo charter flights on behalf of Emery Air Freight between New York and Manchester has been refused. Two recent applications by US charter airlines are currently under consideration.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Non-Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were charged in Northern Ireland with non-scheduled offences; and how many persons were found not guilty of all or some of the offences with which they were charged in the year 1984.

The Prime Minister: I have no recollection of the specific occasion, but it is possible that the Secretary of State for Defence reported to me orally on or shortly after 26 July.

Mr. Clive Ponting

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister (1) on what date she was first made aware that the Ministry of Defence police had identified Mr. Clive Ponting as the person suspected of having leaked official information from the Ministry in the summer of 1984; how this information was communicated to her; and if she will make a statement;

(2) on what date she was first made aware that the papers relating to a leak of official information from the Ministry of Defence in the summer of 1984 had been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions; how this information was communicated to her; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: On 13 August by a telex from my Private Office, although I was not made aware of the name of the person concerned until 17 August.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister on what date she was first made aware that a prosecution was to be brought against Mr. Clive Ponting in respect of an alleged leak of official information from the Ministry of Defence; how this information was communicated to her; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: On 17 August by a telex from my Private Office.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Manpower Services Commission intends to require that youth training scheme trainees are compulsorily transferred to a second placement after six months in their original placement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have no plans to introduce compulsory transfers for young people on youth training scheme programmes after six months. The scheme is a voluntary one, offering 12 months of quality training and planned work experience, and trainees may leave at any time. Some programmes do involve more than one work placement but this is normally made clear to the trainees at the outset of the programme.

School Leavers

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of those school leavers, who upon leaving school during the past two years have not gone into full-time work, further education or training, including the youth training scheme, have now found full-time work.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information of the type requested is not currently available. However it is being gathered in studies in England and Wales which have been commissioned jointly by the Manpower Services Commission, the Department of Employment and the Department of Education and Science. Among the topics to be covered the studies will seek information on the further education, employment and training experience of representative national samples of young people reaching minimum school leaving age during the 1983-84 academic year. A similar separate study is being carried out in Scotland. Preliminary results, covering the experience of this cohort up to the spring of 1985, are expected to become available around the end of this year.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the rate of unemployment in the SW9 postal district of London.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas.

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what new initiatives he intends to take to reduce youth unemployment.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are considering a number of options for the enhancement of provision for young people, including the possibilities of extending training opportunities, but no decisions have yet been made.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been in full-time and part-time employment in each year from 1970 to the present.

Mr. Alan Clark: Comprehensive information is available only for those dates when censuses of employment were conducted and is as follows:

Thousand

	Full-time	Part-time
June 1971	18,308	3,341
June 1972	18,173	3,477
June 1973	18,355	3,828
June 1974	18,187	4,110
June 1975	17,964	4,248
June 1976	17,764	4,284
June 1977	17,828	4,298
June 1978	17,882	4,392
September 1981	16,815	4,499

Censuses of employment have been taken triennially since 1978. Results of the current, September 1984, census are scheduled to become available towards the end of this year.

Honeywell Information Systems Ltd.

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the award to Honeywell Information Systems Ltd. of the contract to supply terminals and micro-computers to unemployment benefit offices.

Mr. Alan Clark: The majority of the equipment being purchased under this £33 million contract will be manufactured in the United Kingdom with only about 10 per cent. coming from Italy and the United States. The supply of the 10,500 VDU terminals has been subcontracted entirely to Lynwood Ltd. — a wholly United Kingdom terminal supplier—representing some 30 per cent. of the capital contract. The terminal computer controllers to be installed in the unemployment benefit offices — over 800 in total — are manufactured at Newhouse in Scotland; this accounts for around 60 per cent. of the contract value. The 10 per cent. of the contract placed outside the United Kingdom is for particular printers (Italy) and certain specialised components (from United States of America). In addition, the maintenance of the equipment will be carried out through United Kingdom field engineers.

Employment Statistics (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what changes have taken place in the number of people employed in the textile and clothing industry in the Yorkshire and Humberside region since June 1979;

(2) what changes have taken place in the numbers of people employed in the steel industry in the Yorkshire and Humberside region since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information is for the period from June 1978 to September 1981 when censuses of employment were taken and is as follows:

Employees in employment in Yorkshire and Humberside

Thousand

Standard industrial classification 1968	June 1978	September 1981	Net change 1978 to 1981
Textiles (Order XIII)	98·2	66·4	−31·8
Clothing (Order XV excluding MLH 450, footwear)	37·2	27·5	−9·7
Iron and steel and steel tubes (MLHs 311 and 312)	65·0	44·9	−20·1

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Employment what changes have taken place in the numbers of people employed in the fishing industry in the Yorkshire and Humberside region since June 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information is for the period from June 1978 to September 1981, when censuses of employment were taken. In that period, the number of employees employed in the fishing industry in Yorkshire and Humberside fell by 700, from 2,700 in 1978 to 2,000 in 1981.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what changes have taken place in the number of people employed in the coal mining industry in the Yorkshire and Humberside region since June 1979;

(2) what changes have taken place in the number of people employed in manufacturing industries in Yorkshire and Humberside region since June 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Regional employment estimates related to the coal mining industry are available only for the period from June 1978 to September 1981 when censuses of employment were taken. In that period, the number of employees employed in the industry in Yorkshire and Humberside fell by 1,300, from 79,400 in 1978 to 78,100 in 1981.

Quarterly estimates of the total numbers of employees in employment in manufacturing industries, analysed by region, are published regularly in Table 1.5 of the labour market data section of Employment Gazette, copies of which are in the Library. Estimates for June 1983 to September 1984, the latest available, were published in the January issue of Employment Gazette. Estimates for June 1979 to March 1983 were contained in table 1.5 of historical supplement No. 1 to the August 1984 issue of Employment Gazette.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment what increase has taken place in the total number of people unemployed in Yorkshire and Humberside region since June 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of unemployed claimants by region are available in the House of Commons Library. Comparisons are affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which enable some men, mainly aged 60 and over, to receive the long term rate of supplementary benefit and national insurance credits without having to sign on at an unemployment benefit office. In the Yorkshire and Humberside region, it is estimated that some 17,100 men were affected.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Unions

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be in a position to report his conclusions on ultra vires payments by students unions.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General considers and acts upon all documented complaints alleging the misuse of student union funds. In addition to consulting higher education interests about student unions, to which I referred in my answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) on 12 February, at col 114, my right hon. Friend will take into account the views of my right hon. and learned Friend on the question of misuse of funds.

Collective Worship

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive a reply from Surrey county council on the question of collective worship in schools.

Mr. Dunn: I am sorry that there has been a delay in reaching a conclusion on a case raised by my hon. Friend. Surrey has now provided the Department with information, and has been asked to clarify some of the points in it. I will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Research Expenditure

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much his Department

Mr. Mellor: We hope to introduce during 1985 a national information collection system on waiting times, following the evaluation of pilot studies. Until such a system is in operation, it is not possible to say how far delays in magistrates' courts have been reduced.

The separate feasibility study of timetabling arrangements has been carried out by the university of Manchester, with the support of the Home Office. A report is expected shortly, and any findings of general interest will be communicated to courts in due course.

Warning and Monitoring Organisation

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department where is the headquarters of the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Cowley, Oxford.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain the functions of the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The present functions of the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation are to:

(a) pass to the general public, public authorities and the armed forces warnings of conventional or nuclear attack;

(b) provide confirmation of nuclear attack;

(c) pass to the general public, public authorities and the armed forces warnings of approach of radioactive fallout;

(d) provide headquarters of regional and local government and of the armed forces in the United Kingdom, and offshore islands and neighbouring countries with details of nuclear bursts and with a scientific appreciation of the path and intensity of fallout; and

(e) provide an emergency meteorological service after attack.

Fandango 85 and Wintex 85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain the relationship between Fandango 85 and Wintex 85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Fandango 85 is one of a series of self-contained exercises conducted by the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation to practise procedures. It will take place during the NATO exercise Wintex—Cimex 85 and draw on the scenario prepared for it. There is no other connection between the two.

Regional Fire Advisers

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each civil defence region, the name, present employment, date appointed and terms of reference of the regional fire adviser for each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A list of regional fire advisers by region from 1979 to the present is given as follows. There are no formal terms of reference but a regional fire adviser is responsible for the co-ordination of emergency fire service planning in his region.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each regional fire adviser from 1979 to 1985 (i) the meetings attended in person or in deputy at which any representative of his Department acting in an official capacity was also present and (ii) the topics discussed at each meeting.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Regional fire advisers attend a wide range of meetings with representatives of Government Departments, local authorities and other public services to discuss various aspects of civil defence planning and training. To list all such meetings would require disproportionate effort.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any employer has refused to allow any employee to become a regional fire adviser.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None since one in 1977.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the means by which the consent of an employer is obtained to the appointment of a regional fire adviser.

Mr. Giles Shaw: By a letter to the fire authority employing a chief fire officer who is to be appointed as regional fire adviser.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministers (Communications)

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if she made any request, instruction or other communication to Ministers, prior to 16 August 1984, concerning action to be taken in the event of any unauthorised disclosure of significant information, whether or not concerned with security, by civil servants, particularly in respect of reports to be made to the Director of Public Prosecutions; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 22, in what ways the implementation of limited list prescribing for National Health Service drugs will vary in respect of Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister: Until the limited list proposals are finalised it is not possible to say in what ways implementation may need to vary in Northern Ireland. It is clear, however, that there will need to be some variations — for example, to take account of the fact that, unlike their counterparts in Great Britain, hospital doctors in Northern Ireland do not issue prescriptions.

Official Secrets Act

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what is the procedure for keeping her informed if papers are sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions and later to the Attorney-General under the Official Secrets Act.

The Prime Minister: The Director of Public Prosecutions does not keep me informed about cases that have been referred to him. It is always open to the Attorney-General, in his discretion, or his Department, to inform me or my office about cases that have been referred to him or to the Director of Public Prosecutions which may raise matters of public importance or interest. The Attorney-General could ask me or other relevant Ministers whether I, or they, know of any considerations which he might want to take into account before he decides whether or not a prosecution would be in the public interest. There is no set procedure.

Sudan (Ethiopian Refugees)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise as a matter of urgency with the Common Market Commission the failure of the Common Market to provide more than 17,000 tonnes of aid to date to Ethiopian refugees in the Sudan; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The European Community and its member states have earmarked 160,000 tonnes of grain for Sudan in 1985. The Foreign Affairs Council, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is attending in Brussels today, will discuss the needs of the Sudan.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister how many tonnes of food aid have been provided to the Ethiopian refugees in the Sudan by the European Economic Community, the United States of America and the rest of the world, respectively.

The Prime Minister: The European Community, as the first step in providing food aid pledged under the commitment made by the European Council on 4 December, has recently purchased 13,700 tonnes of cereals for refugee relief in the Sudan, 3,500 tonnes of which are now being delivered. It has also provided £1·5 million to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) for food purchases. The United States has pledged 45,000 tonnes of cereals for the Ethiopian refugees which is due to arrive in April and 157,000 tonnes for other parts of Sudan.

Her Majesty's Government have provided 15,000 tonnes through the World Food Programme which is now in Port Sudan, and pledged a further £2 million in food aid to UNHCR's programmes in Sudan. No figures are available yet for food aid pledges by other donors to Sudan as a whole or to the Ethiopian refugees there.

Absence from Office (Contact)

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister what arrangements are made when she is on holiday to be contacted by telephone and telex by Ministers and officials and for her to contact by telephone and telex Ministers and officials.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Members for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) and for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on Friday 15 February at column 300.

Classified Information

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister on what date she was first made aware that a leak of official information from the Ministry of Defence had taken place during the summer of 1984; how this information was communicated to her; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister on what date she first learned that there had been a leak of official information from the Ministry of Defence to the hon. Member for Linlithgow; and whether she expressed any view as to whether the culprit, if identified, should be prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act.

Dairy Quotas

Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that sufficient time is allowed for applications to the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales for a review of the estimation of secondary quotas by a local panel.

Mr. Jopling: Yes. The vast majority of appellants have succeeded in submitting their requests for review within the permitted 21-day period.

Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales has exercised its discretion in allowing applications for a review of the estimation of secondary quotas by a local panel, when such applications did not conform to the present timetable.

Mr. Jopling: I understand that a very small number of appeals which were received more than 21 days after notification of local panel decisions have been considered by the tribunal where the tribunal was satisfied that such consideration was justified by the circumstances.

Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications have been considered to date for a review of the estimation of secondary quotas by local panels of the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales.

Mr. Jopling: Up to 13 February 1985, the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales had received 5,738 appeals against the secondary quota decisions of local panels. Of these, 240 have so far been withdrawn by the appellants and 229 have been rejected as out of time. The tribunal completed the bulk of its hearings in England on 14 February and reached the same point in Wales today. I understand that the secretariat to the tribunal has so far identified fewer than 50 cases for which hearings cannot take place during February.

Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications for a review of the estimation of secondary quotas by the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales have so far been considered.

Mr. Jopling: The Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984 (SI 1984/1047) do not provide for a review of decisions made by the dairy produce quota tribunals.

Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications have been received from Shropshire for a review of the secondary quotas estimation by the local panels of the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales.

Mr. Jopling: I regret this information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the details of the discretionary element that has been introduced into the regional development grant.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As under the previous development grant scheme, grant will continue to be paid on an automatic basis. It will be paid in respect of all projects where application is made within the specified time limits and where the published criteria are satisfied. These criteria are contained in the "Guide for Applicants" (RDG/Guide), a copy of which I have placed in the Library.

The Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984 gives discretion on certain aspects to Ministers in regard to the payment of regional development grants as did earlier legislation. The "Guide for Applicants" indicates how such discretion will be exercised.

Teachers (Appointment Procedures)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will bring forward proposals for changes to the present procedures through which teachers and head teachers are appointed in primary and secondary schools in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Comments on the Green Paper "Parental Influence at School" (Cmnd. 9242), which include proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of teachers and head teachers, are being considered and an announcement will be made in due course.

IDC Company

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the contracts undertaken directly for his Department, or for public agencies answerable to his Department, by the IDC Company, over the past five years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: IDC has undertaken only one such contract in the last five years. This was the building of the residential accommodation at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor. Work on the contract started in October 1978 and was completed in March 1982.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Prescriptions

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 298, if he will now list in ascending order the number of prescription items per capita for each member country of the Council of Europe.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Figures are not available for each member country of the Council of Europe. Those that are available come from a variety of non-official sources, relate to different years and are not directly comparable because of the many factors which influence prescribing such as different eligibility rules and public subsidy arrangements. The most recent figures available for prescription items per capita per year are:

	Numbers
Netherlands	4·0
Sweden	4·8
United Kingdom	6·6
Denmark	7·8
Belgium	9·0
Spain	9·6
France	10·0
West Germany	11·2
Italy	11·3
Ireland	11·9

For the reasons set out above, no great significance should be attached to these figures.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to encourage dose-related quantities on prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The National Health Service prescription form (FP10) contains a box which doctors can use to specify the period for which a drug is to be provided. We reminded all doctors of this facility and encouraged them to use it in a leaflet sent to them in 1983.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will advise general practitioners to issue triple prescriptions whereby the patient receives three prescriptions each for one month in place of obtaining a three months' supply.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We see no need for such specific advice. Doctors have been asked to consider economy and safety when making prescribing decisions and they do not need reminding that they are free to issue multiple prescriptions in appropriate cases.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether every product in the limited list will meet the quality standards of the specifications in the British Pharmacopoeia.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All but four of the medicines included in the provisional limited list published for consultation when my right hon. Friend made his announcement and set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) on 10 December 1984 at columns 381-2 are subject of monographs published in the British Pharmacopoeia and must therefore comply with the standards specified in those monographs. Of the remaining four products, three have to meet standards specified in monographs published in the British Pharmaceutical Codex 1973; I understand that these are currently being reviewed by the British Pharmacopoeia Commission with a view to the inclusion of monographs in a future edition the Pharmacopoeia. I also understand that the commission is currently preparing a monograph on the fourth product.

We are considering the advice of the Chief Medical Officer's panel of advisers before deciding which medicines should remain available under the National Health Service from 1 April 1985. The quality of all products on that list will have to comply with the requirements of the Medicines Act and relevant directives of the European Commission.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions about his proposal for a limited list he has had with the Standing Medical Advisory Committee; and what was its advice.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Standing Medical Advisory Committee advises my right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales on the provision of medical services under the National Health Service Acts. Its deliberations are and always have been confidential.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many notifications he has received of cancelled or deferred investment by the pharmaceutical industry as a result of his announced decision on a limited list of prescribed medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Some companies have claimed to us in discussion that investment plans have been deferred and are likely to be cancelled. We have pointed out that most other advanced countries are also trying to reduce their drugs bills and that this country retains several advantages so far as inward investment is concerned such as its attractiveness as a base for pharmaceutical research and development, sound economy, stable political environment, and links with Europe and the Commonwealth.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what account he will take in drawing up the final limited list of the clinical implications of the differing sedative profiles of tranquillisers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The medical and pharmaceutical experts consulted by the Chief Medical Officer on the contents of the limited list have given full consideration to the clinical effects of different tranquillisers.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how, pursuant to his answer of 12 February to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) Official Report, column 151, he will ensure that money saved on the cost of drugs prescribed by general practitioners as a result of the proposed limited list will be spent elsewhere in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The estimated savings from the limited list have been taken into account in the levels of spending in the NHS for 1985-86 announced in the Autumn Statement on 12 November 1984 at column 415. The savings will therefore enable us to maintain the increased expenditure on the Service which that Statement set out.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from general practitioners in rural areas who prescribe and dispense drugs regarding the proposal to ban prescriptions to National Health Service patients of brand-name products which will be excluded from the Government's limited list scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received about 3,500 letters from doctors commenting on our proposals to limit the range of drugs available in certain therapeutic categories. Some of these letters have come from general medical practitioners in rural areas but it would not be possible to identify these without disproportionate cost.

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will allow doctors freedom to prescribe on the National Health Service any drug in cases which, in their clinical opinion, could only be effectively treated by a particular drug or formulation, and the doctor so certifies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We intend to make a comprehensive announcement shortly which will cover the point raised by my hon. Friend.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what meetings he or his ministerial colleagues and officials held in Copenhagen with representatives of the World Health Organisation before he produced his statement on a limited list for prescription drugs; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Chief Medical Officer and I visited the World Health Organisation regional office for Europe in Copenhagen on 2-4 September 1984. Amongst other subjects, we discussed measures being taken in various countries in Europe to control drug costs.

Rent and Rate Rebate Scheme

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of people employed by local authorities on the administration of the rent and rate rebate scheme in June 1982 for (a) England and (b) Wales; and what are the numbers currently employed for the most recent figures available on the housing benefit scheme in (a) England and (b) Wales.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the number of people employed on the administration of the rent and rate rebate schemes in England and in Wales in June 1982 is not held centrally. It is estimated that about 7,800 people were employed on the administration of housing benefit in Great Britain in 1983-84, the latest date for which estimates are available. Separate estimates for England and for Wales are not available.

Departmental Manpower and Costs

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of manpower and costs in his Department were devoted to (a) health services and (b) social security in the last year.

Mr. Fowler: In 1983-84, the last full year for which figures are available class XII manpower and costs for health services and social security were as follows;

	Manpower		Costs
	Staff	Percentage	£ million	Percentage
Health	4,909	5·7	90	7·3
Social Security	81,382	94·3	1,144	92·7
Total	86,291	100	1,234	100

The figures do not include class XI manpower or costs used to run special hospitals, youth treatment centres, artificial limb and appliance centres and some smaller units. In 1983-84 these were:

Manpower: 4,183 staff
Costs: £51·4 million

Patients (Rent)

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department, when paying rent for elderly or infirm patients who have been in hospital, has in operation any system to monitor the length of time for which rent is paid for such tenants.

Mr. Whitney: No, assistance with rent is provided through the housing benefit scheme which is administered by local authorities. It is for authorities to decide, in the light of the circumstances of the individual case, whether, and if so for how long, housing benefit should continue to be paid whilst a claimant is in hospital.

Public Relations Staff

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the annual cost of his Department's public relations section during each of the last five years.

Mr. Fowler: My Department has no section which can be separately identified as public relations. Functions commonly associated with public relations are carried out by Information Officers as part of their duties in the Department's information division.

The following table contains total costs for all professional Information Officers employed in the Department's press office and publicity branch, 1980-84, plus the director and deputy director of information, and the staff of the Departmental house journal.

The figures are average salary costs* and take account of the inner London pay area but do not include costs for common services nor for non-professional support staff.

Year	Information officers in post	Total average salary (£)
1980	20	323,077
1981	20	252,245
1982	19	342,521
1983	19	361,242
1984	19	370,365

*Ready Reckoner for staff and other costs: HM Treasury — 1980.1981.1982.1983.1984.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the present establishment of press officers and public relations staff in his Department.

Mr. Fowler: My Department has no section which can be separately identified as public relations. The Department's Information Division comprises a press office, a publicity branch which is responsible for advertising, preparation of leaflets, making films, exhibitions etc, and a section producing the Departmental House journal.

The division is headed by a director and deputy director. The establishment of professional information officers for the division on 1 February 1985 is as follows:

	Staff Allocation	Staff in post
Director of information	1	1
Deputy director	1	1
Press office	12	10
Publicity	8	6
House journal	3	3

Administrative Costs

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the administrative costs of the National Health Service and the administrative costs of health services in each member country of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We know of no precise figures which would enable this comparison to be made, and indeed the administrative costs of the National Health Service are not capable of precise definition.

Hay Fever Vaccines

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidance to doctors to ensure that hay fever vaccines are refrigerated when held in stock by a general practitioner.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Guidance is already available. Regulations made under the Medicines Act require that vaccines, in common with all medicinal products, should be clearly labelled with any special requirements relating to storage and handling. Information about special requirements must be included in the product data sheets produced by the companies and which are supplied to all general practitioners. It is advised in the British Pharmacopoeia that vaccines should be protected from light and, unless otherwise stated in a specific instance, should be stored at temperatures between 2°-8°C and should not be allowed to freeze.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Fowler: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in each of his Department's 23 resettlement units, how many of the individuals accommodated during the four-week period ended 20 November 1984 had not been accommodated in the same resettlement unit (a) in the previous four-week period, (b) in the previous six months and (c) in the previous year.

Mr. Whitney: This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, for each year from 1978 to 1983 inclusive, how many of those whose unemployment benefit claims have been disallowed suffered this decision because they were deemed to be seasonal workers.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the table.

	Total disallowances	Seasonal worker disallowances
1978	902,100	2,700
1979	930,300	2,900
1980	1,241,700	3,400
1981	1,156,000	3,300
1982	1,174,300	4,000
1983	1,092,500	5,100

Supplementary Benefit (Residential Care)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for the latest year for which figures are available and for each of his Department's local offices, what is the total number of residents of (a) private and voluntary residential care homes and (b) private and voluntary nursing homes which are claiming supplementary benefit as boarders to help them meet the homes' charges;

(2) for the latest year for which figures are available and for each of his Department's local offices, what is the total amount of supplementary benefit paid out to help residents meet the charges of (a) private and voluntary residential care homes and (b) private and voluntary nursing homes.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the information which is available, although not in the precise form requested, is that at December 1983, the latest date for which we have figures, there were 25,800 residents in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes in receipt of supplementary benefit in Great Britain. The average weekly benefit payment was £75·80 and on this basis, estimated annual expenditure was £102 million.

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry. 1983 figures are provisional.

Note: Average benefit payments include an amount paid for personal expenses but are net of any other resources, such as retirement pension, which fail to be taken into account.

AIDS

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if the question of Government guidance to workers in the National Health Service dealing with patients suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome was raised at the Health Services Industrial Advisory Committee on Wednesday 13 February; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will meet a delegation of National Health Service trade unions to discuss Government guidelines to National Health Service staff dealing with acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The interim guidelines on AIDS were published jointly by Health Ministers and the Health and Safety Commission. The Health Service Advisory Committee advises the Health and Safety Commission. I understand, however, that at their meeting on 13 February the interim guidelines were drawn to the attention of that committee's members. Health Service trade unions are represented on the Health Services Advisory Committee. They are also represented on the advisory committee on dangerous pathogens which produced the interim guidelines. We therefore have no plans for separate meetings about the Guidelines with trade unions representing Health Service staff.

Association of Community Health Councils

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has completed his consideration of the more detailed information about levels of expenditure and income of the Association of Community Health Councils; and whether he has reconsidered his decision on funding the association.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our view remains that in the long-term the association should be funded from the budgets of its member community health councils. Grants totalling £35,000 have been paid during the current financial year. A further sum of up to £7,500 is available if necessary to clear the association's accumulated deficit and enable it to begin the new financial year on a sounder basis. Representations have been received from the Association about funding for 1985-86, and we are considering them.

Directors of Social Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of directors of social services who have quit their job since 1979 and as to the length of tenure in their post at the time of their leaving.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not centrally available.

Severe Weather Allowance

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the average payment made under the exceptionally severe weather allowance scheme in 1985; and if he will provide a regional breakdown of this figure.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. When the period during which payments could be made is over, local offices will be asked to make a return so that the total number of payments made this winter and the cost can be ascertained.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether heating payments for severe weather are to be made for the week ended 17 February.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that on the basis of the criteria set out in paragraphs 7426-7459 and appendix 19 of the S Manual (a copy of which is in the Library) the chief adjudication officer has decided to advise local adjudication officers that the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulation 26 has been satisfied in the following areas.

Mr. Ernest Trevor Smart

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the appeal by Mr. Ernest Trevor Smart, of Newtown, to be heard by the Pensions Appeal Tribunal; and if he will take steps to reduce the delay between the notification and hearing of appeals.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. and learned Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Chatterton Hey

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he received an application for funding under the central funding initiative on drugs misuse from Manchester and Salford Methodist mission in respect of improvements at Chatterton Hey; and when he plans to come to a decision on this application.

Mr. John Patten: An incomplete application from the Manchester and Salford Methodist mission for funding in respect of improvements at Chatterton Hey was received on 13 July 1983. Further information was sought in December 1983 and on subsequent occasions as late as 11 February but has not so far been received. A decision cannot be made until the necessary information is available.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what directives he has issued on the question of financing kidney patients being treated by dialysis machines;

(2) what directives he has issued governing the use of dialysis machines.

Mr. John Patten: The financing of haemodialysis services and the use of haemodialysis machines are matters for health authorities, and we have issued no directives. We have, however, asked health authorities to develop services for patients suffering end stage renal failure as a priority within the acute sector, and all regional health authorities have recently agreed a target of accepting new renal patients for treatment at an annual rate of at least 40 per million population by 1987.

Key Housing Association Ltd.

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan may expect a reply to his letter of 14 December 1984 regarding the Key Housing Association Limited and board and lodging charges.

Mr. Whitney: I have written to the right hon. Member today.

NHS (Energy Conservation)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the 10-year energy conservation programme in the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: The Department made special allocations of £13·3 million over the three-year period 1978-79 to 1980-81 to health authorities in England for energy conservation measures.

Health authorities were expected to supplement these allocations from 1979-80 onwards from their own savings resulting from the programme to achieve a minimum average investment of £8 million annually. The programme was intended to secure a total investment for hospitals in England of £28 million over the four years 1978-79 to 1981-82. Thereafter it was considered that the investment of savings resulting from this programme would enable an energy saving programme to continue at this level. This programme is part of the National Health Service's continuing effort in this field which overall has led to a current annual saving of £68 million.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate what measures he is taking to promote both the identification of energy savings in the National Health Service and reinvestment of savings arising from the energy conservation programme in the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: The Department continues to issue guidance that will enable hospitals to monitor their energy consumption and establish targets for reducing it. A computer programme has been made available for making decisions locally, when planning long-term investment in energy saving measures.

The Department's guidance indicates the financial advantages to be obtained from energy conservation and encourages health authorities to re-invest savings along with other cost reduction measures.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings have been made in each year since 1977 in the National Health Service as a result of the energy conservation programme; how much has been reinvested in the programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Savings resulting from the energy conservation programme in the National Health Service since 1977 are as shown in the following table.

Savings £ million

Year	Over 1972-73 (at 1982-83 price levels)	Over each previous year (at 1982-83 price levels)
1978-79	37·222	11·777
1979-80	48·528	11·306
1980-81	54·499	5·971
1981-82	60·216	5·717
1982-83	67·925	7·709
Totals	268·390	42·480

The figures do not take account of changes in the size of the NHS estate. Figures for 1983-84 are not yet available.

Records are not kept centrally of the amount spent by the NHS on energy conservation, but as the average annual saving over the five year period was £8·5 million substantial investment by the NHS would have been required to achieve these savings.

State Retirement Pension Scheme

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue operating the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Whitney: The Government's decisions on the future of the state retirement pension scheme will be announced as part of the outcome of the social security reviews, which we hope to publish in the early part of this year.

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what amount of state earnings-related pension is currently in payment to people retiring in 1985 who have paid into the scheme at the highest contribution rate since its inception.

Mr. Whitney: A person who has paid at the upper earnings limit for national insurance contributions since April 1978 and has retired in 1985 would currently be entitled to an earnings related additional component of £16·21 per week. Very few, if any, people will actually be receiving this maximum amount. In September 1983, the latest date for which information is available, the average payment was £2·50 per week.

Pensions

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the United Kingdom Government spending goes to paying for pensions for retired persons; and how this compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 732]: Comparative information for member states of the European Community are not available in the precise form requested. However, harmonised comparative statistics are published by the European Community as part of the European system of integrated social protection statistics. The Eurostat publication "Social Indicators for the European Community: 1984" includes comparative statistics for both gross domestic product at market prices and the relative expenditure of the old age programme within social protection expenditure.

A full definition of the old age programme is in paragraphs 520-522 of the Eurostat publication "European System of Integrated Social Protection Statistics (ESSPROS): Methodology — Part I: 1981". It is not synonymous with state retirement pensions but also includes the cost of private and occupational pensions and cash payments to the elderly, the cost of staying in old peoples or nursing homes, early retirement payments and a range of local authority services such as home helps or benefits in kind; it does not include the expenditure on medical care for old people or increases in pensions for dependants. The table indicates for member states the proportion of gross domestic product at market prices allocated to the old age programme at 1981.

European Community: expenditure on programmes for old age as a proportion of gross domestic product at market prices: 1981

United Nations Decade for Women

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the range of child-care facilities described in Her Majesty's Government's answer to question A 3.2.6 of part II of the United Nations end of decade for women questionnaire.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to the reply, 12 February 1985, c. 167]: We are satisfied as to the range of child-care facilities. We are concerned that working mothers should be able to make the best arrangements possible for their children, and that these arrangements should be stable and flexible enough to fit in with the parents' requirements. It is however particularly important that these requirements should provide a good standard of care for the individual child. Day-care will continue to be primarily a matter of private arrangement between parents and private and voluntary resources except where there are special needs, but we should like to see local authorities continuing to develop their supporting, supervisory and information roles alongside their registration functions. The Department is currently reviewing its long-standing guidance on day-care provision and the opportunity will be taken in publishing revised guidance to encourage the continuation of these developments.

In October 1983 we began a special initiative at a total cost of £6 million up to March 1987 to help stimulate voluntary sector provision for families with pre-school children including particularly families with working mothers on low income.

Unemployed Persons (Statistics)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take in response to the recent publication of statistics from the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys longitudinal study showing a 20 per cent. excess of death in unemployed men and their wives.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 February 1985, c. 168]: I have studied these research findings carefully. We will continue to monitor research in this field. We are also considering with the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys whether further analysis of the longitudinal study data, including that from the 1981 census now available, would be worthwhile. The Government's priority, however, is to continue to pursue the policies which they believe to be the best way to bring down unemployment, and to continue to meet the health needs of the population.

Dental Undergraduates

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he implemented the recommendation to reduce the intake of dental undergraduates in 1984; and what means he used to secure that reduction;

(2) how many new dental undergraduates were admitted for dental education in England and Wales in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 281-2]: Implementation of the 10 per cent. reduction in dental school intake, which I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 22 July 1983, at column 272, is a matter for the University Grants Committee. I understand the reduction is expected to be fully achieved by the academic year 1985-86.

The number of new dental undergraduates starting in the Autumn term in England and Wales for each academic year was as follows:

	Number
1982-83	798
1983-84	766
1984-85	741

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor or the Exchequer if he will compare, giving the latest figures available, the gross income in pound sterling equivalent at which income tax on earned income becomes payable at 30 per cent. and 50 per cent. in the United Kingdom, with the levels in the United States of America, France, Germany and Japan, for (a) a single person, (b) a single-wage married couple and (c) a single-wage couple with two children.

Mr. Moore: The information requested is given in the following tables.

Table 1

Gross income in £ sterling at which income tax on employment income becomes payable at 30 per cent.

	Single person	Married couple	Married couple with two dependent children
United Kingdom	2,006	3,156	3,156
United States of America	21,965	28,485	30,270

Notes:

1. The figures relate to income of the year 1984 (1984-85 in the case of the United Kingdom).

2. Conversions to sterling were made at the exchange rates prevailing on 4 February 1985. They do not fully reflect differences in purchasing power between sterling and the other currencies.

3. It is assumed that the income of the married couples is wholly employment income of the husband.

4. Personal reliefs (including child tax allowances, where given, but not child benefits) employment income reliefs and other standard reliefs have been taken into account, as well as income tax relief for social security contributions in certain countries.

5. (i) The rates of 30 per cent. and 50 per cent. in the tables are actual tax rates, that is, nominal rates adjusted where appropriate for the reliefs mentioned above.

(ii) Where the actual tax rate is never precisely 30 per cent. or 50 per cent., the rate applicable to the income level in the table is given in brackets.

6. (i) The figures in the table reflect national (Federal) income taxes only.

(ii) Local income taxes are levied in Japan and the United States of America. The figures for combined national (Federal) and local income taxes at typical rates are as follows:—

Note:
The figures for 1983 are provisional.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the average cost of keeping a person in a board-run old people's home in each of the last eight years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is:

Average Running Cost per resident per week

1977	51·95
1978	59·91
1979	64·97
1980	78·20
1981	100·77
1982	111·19
1983	119·86
1984	126·75

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been accommodated in old people's homes run by each of the health and social services boards in each of the last eight years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The answer is as follows:

Number of People Accommodated in Old People's Homes

Year	Eastern	Northern	Southern	Western
1976	957	797	461	416
1977	1,032	795	463	424

1983	1,351	885	520	512

Note: Figures for 1983 are provisional.

Property Conversions

Mr. Killedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many conversions from houses or other buildings to flats have taken place since 1956; and how many new flats or apartments have been built since that date.

Mr. Chris Patten: Such statistics are not maintained.

Mr. Killedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans to update the provisions of the Rent (Northern Ireland) Order 1978, in regard to property conversions that took place since 1956.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Job Creation

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is satisfied that present procedures permit early revision of new proposals for further assistance for job creation in those local enterprise development unit-assisted companies which reach previously agreed targets ahead of schedule; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The local enterprise development unit is not debarred from making additional assistance available to companies reaching agreed targets ahead of schedule. However, the attainment of employment targets is only one of the factors that need to be considered in deciding whether further assistance should be offered. Each case is judged on its merits.

Transport Bill

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if it is his intention to introduce all or any of the measures contained in the Transport Bill in Northern Ireland either by separate legislation or by Order in Council.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Capital Grants

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the uptake of capital grants for local enterprise development unit-sized companies; and if he will make it his policy to maintain the present levels of such grants for such companies.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 270]: I estimate that some 40 per cent. by value of payments under the Standard capital grants scheme in 1983-84 were made to companies with fewer than 50 employees. The value of these payments was £16 million. In addition, capital and other grants are available on a selective basis from the local enterprise development unit; in 1983-84 the total value of these grants was £9·4 million.

I am conscious of the importance of maintaining a simple and predictable scheme of assistance with capital costs, particularly for smaller companies. This has been an important consideration in our review of the standard capital grants scheme, the outcome of which I hope to announce soon.

Prisoners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the current size of the present prison population in Northern Ireland, categorised by age and by sex in the following groups: aged under 18 years, 18 to 25 years, 25 to 30 years, 30 to 40 years, 40 to 50 years, 50 to 60 years and over 60 years; and if he will give a breakdown of the length of sentence being served by percentage of the total prison population;

(2) what is the number of prisoners in Northern Ireland prisons, the age structure of convicted prisoners in the prisons of Northern Ireland and the number of convicted prisoners serving sentences for terrorist offences.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 713]: The latest date for which the information requested is available is 2 December 1984. On that date the total prison population — including unconvicted inmates and persons detained under sentence in young offenders centres and under section 73 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 — was 2,185. The details requested in respect of sentenced inmates are set out in the following table.

2. The figures without brackets related to male inmates and those in brackets to female inmates.
3. The figures include those detained in Young Offenders Centres.
4. Persons detained at the Secretary of State's pleasure are included in the life sentence figures.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereal Substitutes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the principal cereal substitutes with the prices paid by the compounders, imported into (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Economic Community; and if there is any likelihood of a levy system being introduced to bring these products into the cereal regime.

Mr. MacGregor: The principal cereal substitutes imported into (a) the United Kingdom, and (b) the European Community as a whole, together with price information where this is available, are as follows:

Average import (cif) price, December 1984

United Kingdom	(£/tonne)
Maize Gluten feed	109·17
Manioc	*101·00
Brans and Sharps	77·77
Citrus Pulp	107·72
Brewers' and Distillers' Grains	99·87

Source: Customs and Excise Home Grown Cereals Authority.
* February (ex-store).

Market price, 1 February 1985

European Community	($US/tonne)
Manioc	88
Maize Gluten Feed	119
Brans and Sharps	n.a.
Citrus Pulp	104
Maize Germ Cake	n.a.

Source: EC Commission.

Community imports of manioc in excess of levels agreed with supplying countries attract the full import levy for barley. A levy system operates for all Community imports of brans and sharps. The European Commission has been given a mandate to negotiate annual import quotas for maize gluten feed and other by-products of maize refining which would involve a modification of the present zero tariff binding.

Horse Breeding

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications for European agriculture guidance and guarantee fund grants have been made by dairy farmers to take up horse breeding.

Mr. MacGregor: I am aware of no such applications in the United Kingdom and I have no information about any in other member states.

Veterinary Investigation Centres

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of specimens each veterinary investigation centre has handled since 1975.

Mr. Jopling: The information is as follows:

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested but the number of persons proceeded against for non-scheduled offences in the year 1984 was 54,112. Records on findings of guilt relate only to the principal offence in each case; on that basis, the number of persons found not guilty of non-scheduled offences was 2,367.

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for 1984, how many prisoners were remanded in custody prior to each trial for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: 1,005 persons were first remanded in custody in 1984 charged with scheduled offences, and 905 with non-scheduled offences. Of the 868 persons who were remanded in custody at the time of trial during 1984, 411 were charged with scheduled offences and 457 with non-scheduled offences.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for 1984, what percentage of prisoners on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively, were (a) given a non-custodial sentence, (b) given a custodial sentence and (c) found not guilty or not proceeded against.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the exact form requested. However, the following details are available for those persons on custodial remand at the time of trial in 1984:

Disposal	Scheduled Offences		Non-Scheduled Offences
	Number of persons	per cent.	Number of persons	per cent.
Non-Custodial sentence	58	14	92	20
Custodial sentence	275	67	282	62
Discharged at Court (including acquittals or Absolute discharge)	78	19	83	18
Total	411	100	457	100

Fair Employment Agency (Membership)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has appointed a member of a secret society, the Knights of St. Columbanus, as a member of the Fair Employment Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: Appointments to the Fair Employment Agency are made on the basis of an individual's personal qualities, experience and likely contribution to the work of the agency, and individual members have varied interests and backgrounds. One recent appointee is a member of the Knights of St. Columbanus. I am satisfied that members of the agency discharge their responsibilities competently and with the integrity which the task requires.

Home Helps

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are being provided with a home help by each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland; and how this compares with each of the last four years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many home help hours have been provided in each of the last five years by each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested. The following table shows the recorded number of hours for which home helps were paid in each of the last five years by each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland. Paid hours do not necessarily represent hours of service to clients as they may include hours credited for "double" time, statutory holidays, annual leave and sick leave.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been spent on the home help service by each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information is not available covering all the costs of the home help service. The following figures represent expediture on home help salaries and incidental expenses and do not include items such as the salaries of professional and clerical staff involved in providing the service.

Mr. Chris Patten: The joint board/Department working group has completed its report which should be published by the end of February 1985.

Geriatric Care

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average cost per week of keeping an old person in geriatric care in hospitals in each of the health and social services board areas; and how this compares with each of the last eight years.

Old People's Homes

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are presently living in old people's homes run by voluntary and private organisations; how many of those people have been referred to these homes by each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland; and how this compares with each of the last eight years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

production in response to a further defence requirement. It would not be in the national interest to give details of future production of plutonium, which will be kept at the minimum level required to meet defence needs.

Soil Survey

Mr. Lilley asked the Prime Minister if, in view of their departmental interests in the services provided by the Soil Survey of England and Wales, she will extend the joint Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food Department of the Environment Committee considering its funding to include officials of the Ministry of Defence, Department of Education and Science and Welsh Office.

The Prime Minister: In my reply of 13 December at column 547, to my hon. Friend I made clear that I did not favour the idea of joint departmental funding. In the light of the decision announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on future funding by his Department, I believe the right way forward is for all potential customers, whether in the public or in the private sector, to examine their future needs and to consider whether the Soil Survey might undertake any work which is required.

Sir Ewen Broadbent (Ponting Case)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister who authorised the statement made by Sir Ewen Broadbent concerning the Ponting case on the BBC 1 o'clock news on 15 February; and whether she was consulted or in any way involved in the decision that that statement should be made.

The Prime Minister: Sir Ewen Broadbent was approached by BBC Radio 4 on the morning of 15 February with a request for an interview about his involvement in the circumstances leading up to the decision to prosecute Mr. Ponting under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. Sir Ewen Broadbent sought, and obtained, the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to his taking part in this interview. I was not consulted about, nor involved in any way, in the handling of Sir Ewen's request.

Gipsies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the resolution, of the European Parliament (document 1-1544/83 (PE79.328/fin)) on the situation of gipsies in the community.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government have noted the resolution referred to by the hon. Member. Present policies remain unchanged.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Output

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the reduction in manufacturing output between (a) 1973 and 1983 and (b) 1979 and 1983, together with the smallest reduction over any period of 10 years and four years, respectively, in the period 1955 to 1973.

Mr. Channon: The information on changes in manufacturing output is as follows. In the period from 1955 to 1973, there were no reductions in manufacturing output over any 10 year or four-year span.

*Changes in Manufacturing Output

Year	per cent.
1973 to 1983	−15
1979 to 1983	−12

* Manufacturing is defined as divisions 2-4 of the Standard Industrial Classification (Revised 1980).

Home Taping

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to deal with the problem of unauthorised private recording of copyright material.

Mr. Pattie: A Green Paper, entitled "The Recording and Rental of Audio and Video Copyright Material", is to be published this afternoon. The paper examines in depth the problem of unauthorised home taping of copyright material and puts forward a possible solution. It also discusses the related issues of recording of broadcasts for educational purposes and rental of pre-recorded copyright material.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further plans he has for changing the role and resources of the British Overseas Trade Board; what representations he has received on the subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 15 February 1985, c. 304]: My right hon. Friend keeps under continual review all parts of his Department, including the BOTB. He has no present plans to change the role of the British Overseas Trade Board. The financial resources expected to be made available for the export promotion programme were included in the White Paper on public expenditure published in January 1985. The BOTB itself gave further details and made proposals for allocating its budget to individual schemes in a consultation document of 3 December 1984, which is available in the Library of the House. It has received a large response to the proposals and will take full account of the views expressed in deciding how best to use the funds available.

Regional Assistance (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the total planned reduction of £300 million in the cost of regional assistance is expected to occur in the Yorkshire and Humberside region.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 18 February 1985, c. 363-66]: Estimates of the reduction in expenditure on regional assistance are not available in respect of individual planning regions in England.

Tourist Industry

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will broaden the definition of regional assisted areas eligible for European Economic Community tourism assistance to include both rural development areas and the textile industry and coal and steel industry restructuring areas.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 18 February 1985, c. 363]: Aid for eligible categories of tourism projects (which vary between areas) is available in all areas which receive national regional aid as defined in the regulation governing the application of the European regional development fund. In the United Kingdom this comprises all assisted areas, including the whole of Northern Ireland, certain small areas covered by the operations of the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Development Board for Rural Wales, and some non-assisted areas in which ERDF non-quota schemes are in operation. As well as many rural development areas, this includes all the important coal, steel, shipbuilding and textile restructuring areas. In addition, special loan facilities are possible in coal and steel restructuring areas under arrangements made by the ECSC. Neither the ERDF regulation nor the ECSC schemes provide for a situation in which only EC tourism assistance can be made available in any area.

ENVIRONMENT

Ronan Point and Tower Blocks

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 23 October 1984, Official Report, columns 553-54, from the Minister for Housing and Construction, he will make a further statement concerning the progress made by the Building Research Establishment into Ronan Point and other Taylor-Woodrow-Anglia blocks.

Mr. Gow: The Building Research Establishment has examined reports prepared for the London borough of Newham by the Building Design partnership and Thomas Akroyd and for the Newham Tower Blocks Tenants' Association by Mr. Sam Webb. It has also made its own assessment of the structural behaviour of Ronan Point under the loads, both normal and abnormal, to which the building might be subjected. The BRE's report of its assessment will be published as soon as possible.

The BRE concludes that, although Ronan Point has since 1968 carried all the loads, including high wind loads, to which it has been subjected and that these loads have approached the maximum which it might be expected to encounter, without showing any signs of distress, the ends of the H2 joints in the flank walls of the lower storeys of the building do not provide that wide margin of safety which is generally considered acceptable for buildings of this type.

The BRE has considered the likely performance of Ronan Point under abnormal loads such as could be caused by an explosion or fire. Though explosion in any building may cause serious damage, the BRE concludes that, in view of the measures taken already to strengthen the building, the risk that an explosion could cause progressive collapse of Ronan Point, such as occurred in 1968, is remote, provided steps are taken to prevent the use of liquefied petroleum gas for heating. The BRE concludes that it is extremely unlikely that such collapse could be caused by fire.

The BRE considers that the gaps which occur at junctions between cladding panels and floor slabs are unacceptable, since they could allow the spread of fire and fumes between adjacent flats.

The BRE concludes that certain remedial works are necessary at Ronan Point.

The conclusions drawn from the assessment of Ronan Point are likely to apply in some degree to other Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings, depending on the details of the construction in each case. Proper standards of safety should apply in all these buildings. In particular, all Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings of 14 or more storeys in height in which H2 joints are of the same design as those in Ronan Point should be appraised to establish whether these joints provide adequate margins of safety.

All Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings should be appraised to establish whether the joints between panels can resist the spread of fire and fumes adequately.

The BRE is ready to discuss with authorities methods of inspection and appraisal and the extent to which their conclusions apply to particular Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings.

The Department is writing today to those authorities which own Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings to inform them of the action which we consider necessary. Copies of the Department's letter are being placed in the Library.

Caravan Sites Act 1968

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in setting targets for local authorities and their grant-related expenditure, he takes account of the expenditure which those authorities which are designated under section 11 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968 may face.

Mr. Macfarlane: The principles on which targets and GREs have been calculated are set out in the rate support grant report for each year. No separate account is taken of expenditure under that section.

Site Examination, Elstow

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to make, under section 24 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, a special development order for the geological examination of a site at Elstow in Bedfordshire.

Mr. Macfarlane: The special development order will cover geological investigations both for Elstow and for at least two other sites which NIREX has been asked to select for consideration along with Elstow. It will be laid before Parliament as soon as possible after NIREX has announced the other sites it wishes to investigate.

West Midlands (Industrial Land)

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the amount of available industrial land in the west midlands county council area.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not collected by my Department. However, I understand that surveys by local authorities show that there are about 3·500 acres of vacant industrial land in the Black Country and a further 500 acres in Birmingham. Much of this land is not immediately available for development because of dereliction and other problems.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received from those wishing to develop high technology industrial sites in the midlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The Department's policy on high technology development is contained in the annex to circular 16/84.

Structure Plans

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to abolish the structure plan system.

Mr. Macfarlane: No, but in Greater London and the metropolitan counties it is proposed that structure and local plans should be replaced by unitary development plans.

West Chellaston, Derby

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of the inquiry into the planning application at West Chellaston, Derby.

Mr. Macfarlane: The report of the inspector who held the inquiry has been received and my right hon. Friend will issue his decision as soon as possible.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to ensure that only persons with adequate qualifications and experience are involved in making recommendations or issuing licences under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: Existing procedures ensure that advice is obtained from suitably qualified organisations or persons before any decision to issue a licence is reached, under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

General licences are issued only after consultation with the Department's statutory adviser, the Nature Conservancy Council.

Leicester (House Building)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing starts were reported by Leicester city council in each of the past five years.

Sir George Young: The numbers of housing starts reported by Leicester city council for the years 1979 to 1983 appear in issues 53, 57, 65, 66 and 70, respectively, of "Local Housing Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for January to September 1984 are in the latest issue No. 72.

Housing Defects Act

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from any individual local authority, or local authority association, about difficulties encountered in implementing the Housing Defects Act fully; what steps he is taking to resolve those difficulties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: My Department has received a number of representations from local authorities and the local authority associations about various aspects of the implementation of the Housing Defects Act 1984 which came into force on 1 December last. As I explained in my reply of 30 January, at columns 179-80, to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) we plan to consult the local authority associations on the arrangements being made by the National House Building Council to provide for approval of methods of repair and an associated warranty scheme for prefabricated reinforced concrete houses just as soon as those arrangements are finalized.

Council House Sales

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the following information on sales of dwellings by each local authority in England up to September 1984 (a) the number of right-to-buy claims received since October 1980, (b) the number of right-to-buy claims admitted, (c) the number of right-to-buy sales completed, (d) the number of right-to-buy sales with a council mortgage, (e) the total number of sales, right-to-buy and voluntary, completed since April 1979, (f) the total number of sales of flats, right-to-buy and voluntary, completed since April 1979, (g) the total number of dwellings owned by each authority in April 1984 and (h) the total number of sales as a percentage of the total number of dwellings owned.

Mr. Gow: The information provided by local authorities and requested by my hon. Friend is contained in the table which I have placed in the Library today.

ENERGY

Newark (Oil, Gas and Coal)

Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites of exploration for, and excavation of (a) oil, (b) gas and (c) coal in the Newark constituency.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Sites for the exploration of oil and gas are as follows. We do not differentiate between oil and gas sites before wells are drilled. Excavation of coal reserves is taking place in the Newark constituency at Bevercotes colliery and since the beginning of 1984 seven boreholes have been sunk in the constituency at the locations shown on the list. There are no NCB opencast activities in the constituency.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average dollar price per barrel of oil from the North sea fields sold to the British National Oil Corporation in each month in 1984; and what was the price the British National Oil Corporation paid for it.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The average dollar price per barrel of oil purchase by the British National Oil Corporation under the participation agreements was $30·00 from 1 January to 17 October 1984 and $28·65 from then to the end of the year for Brent blend. (Prices for other grades were set at appropriate differentials varying between $1·00 less than Brent blend and $0·35 more than Brent blend). Prices paid for other oil, and prices received by BNOC in respect of its sales, are commercially confidential.

Cash Limits

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of any details of any changes to his Department's cash limit.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 93]: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit on Class IV, Vote 5 will be increased by £20 million from £142,869,000 to £162,869,000.

The increase represents provision for a further grant of £25 million to the British National Oil Corporation, the reasons for which were explained in the minute which my Department laid before the House on 13 February 1985.

The corporation's external financing requirement for 1984-85 is revised from £41 million to £66 million. There are reduced requirements amounting to £5 million elsewhere on Class IV, Vote 5. The net increase of £20 million in public expenditure will be charged to the Reserve.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Nuclear Burst

14. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate what effect a one megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles would have on the equipment and resources in his care.

Sir Keith Joseph: The resulting nuclear electromagnetic pulse would damage electronic and electrical equipment.

University Funding

15. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the change in real terms in the annual university funding between 1978-79 and 1984-85.

Mr. Brooke: Recurrent grant to universities in Great Britain allocated by the University Grants Committee is estimated to have increased in 1983-84 cost terms by about 5 per cent. between the financial years 1978-79 and 1984-85, when adjusted to take account of the increases in grant to compensate for changes in the level of the undergraduate home tuition fee. The figures have not been adjusted to take account of other funding changes in this period.

Mathematics and Science Training

16. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the teaching of mathematics and science in the fourth and fifth forms of secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: We believe that mathematics and a broad and balanced course in science have an essential place in the curriculum of all pupils up to the age of 16.

Church Primary Schools (Capital Works)

17. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by what date within the next 12 months submissions must be made for consideration for inclusion in the list of church primary schools for capital works in the year 1987.

Mr. Dunn: The Department will write to all local education authorities in June inviting them to submit details of their expenditure plans for 1986-87 for county and voluntary controlled schools, and to list projects submitted by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools. Authorities will be asked to respond by late August so that the allocations for 1986-87 can be announced by the end of the year.

European Space Agency

18. Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much money has now been committed from the science budget for the research programme of the European Space Agency, and in which years; whether the total science budget has been increased to accommodate the additional expenditure; and which other areas of research have been cut.

Mr. Brooke: At the Ministerial Council meeting of the European Space Agency held in January in Rome, which was attended by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology, it was agreed that the budget of the agency's science programme would rise steadily from its 1984 level of 127 million accounting units to 162 million accounting units (at constant prices) by 1989. In 1984-85 the sum paid to the agency from the science budget, through the Science and Engineering Research Council, is estimated at £11·96 million. The size of the United Kingdom's contributions to the agency's increased science programme in 1985-86 and later years, and how those sums will be found, have yet to be determined.

Departmental Services (Privatisation)

19. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the common services in his Department contracted out to private contractors.

Sir Keith Joseph: The list is as follows:
Most office and window cleaning
Laundry

Maintenance of vehicles
Maintenance of computers and office machinery
Maintenance of buildings for which my Department is responsible
Out-of-hours security in the Darlington office
The staff restaurant in the Darlington office
Some provision of hospitality (buffet, lunches, etc.)
Provision of typists, by private agencies
Provision of telephonists for the Department's main office
Periodic use of management consultants
Computer bureaux and consultancy services
Some external training
Some graphic design work
Some work on video production
Some use of private carriers for the transit of material

In addition, the Department purchases services from other Government Departments (such as Her Majesty's Stationery Office, the Property Services Agency, and the Central Office of Information) which those Departments in turn often contract out to the private sector.

NATFHE (Discussions)

20. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next intends meeting representatives of the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the effects of the Government's expenditure plans on further and higher education.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so at present but he has frequently met representatives of the association in the past and is always ready to do so again.

Student Statistics

21. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students were in full-time education in October 1979 and October 1984, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 866,000 (full-time and sandwich) students at universities in Great Britain and further education establishments in England compared with 765,000 in 1979.

Medical Students (Grants)

22. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will review the grants to medical students.

Mr. Brooke: Grants to medical students are paid at the same rates and under the same conditions as for other mandatory award-holders. Rates of grant for the coming academic year 1985-86 will be announced as soon as practicable.

54. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of grant paid to medical students.

Mr. Brooke: Medical students' entitlement to grant is calculated in the same way as for other students. Students undertaking clinical medical training qualify for higher than average awards because of longer than standard terms.

Teachers (Pay)

23. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has recently held discussions with the teachers' representatives on the Burnham committee regarding teachers' pay and the industrial action of the teachers' unions.

Sir Keith Joseph: No. Teachers' pay is a matter for the Burnham committee and not therefore one that I normally discuss with the teachers' unions.

24. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made in the negotiations on teachers' pay and conditions.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor).

32. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average teacher's salary at present; and how that compares, in cash terms and in real terms, with the average teacher's salary for 1978-79.

Sir Keith Joseph: The average salary (excluding allowances) of full-time teachers in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales at 1 April 1979 was approximately £5,400. The average at 1 April 1984 is some £9,650, an increase of about £4,250 or some 79 per cent. in cash terms. This represents an increase in real terms, measured against the rise in the retail price index over the same period, of about 9 per cent.

43. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate the latest position on the teachers' pay claim; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current teachers' pay negotiations.

50. Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current position in negotiations on teachers' pay.

68. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

73. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the negotiations over teachers' salaries.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor).

Science and Engineering Graduates

25. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures have been taken to increase the supply of science and engineering graduates from polytechnics and universities.

Sir Keith Joseph: The numbers of such graduates are being increased as a result of the information technology in higher education initiative, which I announced on 16 December 1982 at columns 187-89; the change in subject emphasis following the National Advisory Body's advice on academic planning in 1984-85; and through the invitation of the University Grants Committee to universities to admit additional students in science and technology in 1984-85 and 1985-86. The case for further measures is currently under review.

Universities (Recurrent Grant)

26. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Government's proposals for the recurrent grant to the universities.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's expenditure plans (Cmnd. 9428) include provision for recurrent grant in cash terms by financial years of £1,280 million for 1985-86, £1,315 million for 1986-87 and £1,348 million for 1987-88. The figure for 1985-86 is subject to parliamentary approval and those for later years to review in future public expenditure surveys in the usual way.

Teachers (Professional Standards)

27. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the measures he is taking to improve professional standards in the teaching service.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government's policies were set out in the March 1983 White Paper "Teaching Quality." They include improvements in initial and in-service teacher training, measures to promote a better match between qualifications and the needs of schools, and the development of appraisal of teachers' performance.

Action to improve initial teacher training has been taken through the issue of rigorous criteria for the assessment of courses and the establishment of the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education to review all existing courses against the criteria. A scheme of Government grants to local education authorities to stimulate in-service teacher training in designated national priority areas has been introduced. Future arrangements for in-service training are currently under review in the light of recommendations from the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers. A research project has been commissioned to explore the approaches to performance appraisal, and resources are available for 1985-86 through education support grants to finance further research and development work by selected local education authorities.

Teachers' Organisations (Discussions)

28. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met leaders of teachers' organisations; and what was discussed.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) and for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery).

University Tenure

29. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce his final decisions concerning university tenure.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend announced on 1 August 1984 at column 268 the Government's decision to introduce, when the parliamentary timetable allows, legislation to limit academic tenure in the form in which it is granted in some universities. Detailed proposals for legislation will be brought forward in due course.

Education (Expenditure)

30. Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total expenditure on education in 1978-79 and 1984-85, both at 1984-85 prices.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information is as follows:

	£ million—1984-85 cost prices
	1978-79	1984-85
Total expenditure on education	13,268	13,198

Nursery Education

31. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number and proportion of full-time places in nursery education compared to part-time places.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1984, there were 42,992 full-time pupils and 215,609 part-time pupils in maintained nursery schools and nursery classes of maintained primary schools in England. Full-time pupil numbers were just under 17 per cent. of the total.

Public Expenditure White Paper

33. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications of the White Paper on public expenditure, for primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's plans for local authority expenditure in 1985-86 and the later years allow authorities to develop and implement policies to provide a broad and balanced curriculum for pupils of all abilities in primary and secondary schools. In particular, provided that costs are contained and savings made where feasible, the plans permit a continuing modest improvement in pupil-teacher ratios and improved levels of expenditure per pupil on books and equipment, and on repairs and maintenance. The position will vary between authorities depending on factors such as their expenditure targets and their progress in taking out of use surplus places, and redeploying resources, as school rolls fall.

Medical Research Council (Grants)

34. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the recent White Paper on public expenditure plans will affect research grants available to the Medical Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: The White Paper on the Government's expenditure plans 1985-86 to 1987-88 (Cmnd. 9428) allow for a net increase in the funding of science through the Department's science budget, above previous projections, of £11 million in 1985-86 and £8 million in each of the two subsequent years. On 10 January my right hon. Friend announced, in the light of advice from the Advisory Board for Research Councils (ABRC), that in 1985-86 the Medical Research Council (MRC) is to receive a grant-in-aid from the science budget of £122·3 million, which represents an increase of £2·1 million over the previously published planning figure for that year. The MRC's grant-in-aid in 1986-87 will be decided by my right hon. Friend in the light of further advice from the ABRC in late 1985, and that for 1987-88 a year later. It is, however, for the MRC to decide on the distribution of its resources among the various modes of supporting research, of which research grants is one.

Science Research Budget

35. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received concerning the adequacy of the science research budget for 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received about 50 letters concerning the adequacy of the science budget for 1985-86.

Misuse of Drugs

36. Mr. Dover asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what new measures he proposes to take in schools and colleges as a contribution to the prevention of the misuse of drugs by young people.

Mr. Dunn: The Government attach great importance to combating this problem. I represent the Department on the interdepartmental ministerial group on the misuse of drugs. We have funded jointly with the Department of Health and Social Security a programme of market research to establish how a prevention campaign should be targeted. Further action is now in hand in several areas.

i. A contract is being negotiated with the National Foundation for Educational Research to undertake work to analyse and evaluate the types and level of activity by local education authorities in combating drug misuse.

ii. Further research work by the Health Education Council, in collaboration with others, for the preparation of suitable curriculum materials is being discussed.

iii. The Department is playing its part in the preparation of a training film for professionals.

A booklet of advice for teachers and others in the education service is being prepared by the Department. This will be sent to local education authorities with more general advice on how they can play their part in combating drug misuse.

Further action is under consideration.

Literacy and Numeracy

37. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what current proposals there are for the improvement of the standard of literacy and numeracy in schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's policies are designed to secure improvements in the standards achieved by pupils of all abilities across the whole of the school curriculum. In English, Her Majesty's Inspectorate's paper "English from 5 to 16" (published in October 1984) sets out, for discussion, objectives to be reached by most pupils at the ages of seven, 11 and 16. In mathematics, measures taken in the three years since the Cockcroft report was published include dissemination of the report's findings; support from September 1985, under the education support grant scheme, for additional advisers and advisory teachers in almost all LEAs; the inclusion of mathematics in the in-service training grants scheme; and sponsorship of research and development work. The introduction of the GCSE examination will encourage further improvements in both subjects.

Universities (Grant)

38. Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total grant to British universities in 1979, at 1985 prices; and what it is for the current year.

Mr. Brooke: Recurrent grant to universities in Great Britain by the University Grants Committee is estimated to have increased in 1983-84 cost terms from £1,022 million in the financial year 1978-79 to £1,074 million in the financial year 1984-85, when adjusted to take account of increases in the grant to compensate for changes in the level of the undergraduate home tuition fee. The figures have not been adjusted to take account of other funding changes in this period.

Medical and Dental Students (Grants)

39. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had regarding grant levels for medical and dental students.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received some 260 such representations since the increase of £2·80 in real terms in the extra weeks allowance payable to clinical medical and dental students and others was introduced on 1 September 1984.

Under-fives

40. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the change in the number of under five-year-olds in education, both in absolute terms and as a percentage of the year group, from 1979 to date.

Mr. Dunn: The number of pupils aged under five years in maintained nursery and primary schools in England has increased from 428,640 in January 1979 to 495,018 in 1984 — an increase of 66,378. The corresponding proportions of the under-five population are 37 per cent. and 42 per cent.

Teachers (Industrial Action)

41. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the effects of the current industrial action by certain teaching unions on pupils' education.

Sir Keith Joseph: The National Union of Teachers has called on its members to refuse to supervise pupils at lunchtime, take part in any school activity out of timetabled school hours, handle school meals payments or stand in for absent colleagues. I understand that the effects of this action vary between and within local education authorities. While the disruption does not seem to have had a significant or widespread effect, I am very concerned that children's education should be subject to any interruption or uncertainty and I deplore the intention of the two largest teacher unions to cause further disruption by taking strike action from next week.

University Grants Committee

42. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met members of the University Grants Committee; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend last met the University Grants Committee on 1 November 1984 when a number of issues of current interest were discussed.

Grammar Schools

44. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he issues any guidance about the proportion of pupils who go to grammar schools to those local education authorities where selection still takes place.

Mr. Dunn: No. It is for local education authorities which retain selective secondary education to decide what criteria to adopt in considering whether pupils are suitable for admission to grammar schools. The proportion of pupils attending such schools will necessarily vary from time to time and place to place.

Open University

45. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what reduction in expenditure will be required of the Open University in the period 1984 to 1986.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has not set an amount by which the university is required to reduce its expenditure. The university set itself a savings target of £13·2 million for the period which took into account reductions in grant, its own estimates of inflation and additional costs above inflation. The reduction in grant on a comparable basis, allowing for Government estimates of inflation, was £4·7 million. The university has the freedom to increase its income through higher fees.

Student Earnings

46. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much is the maximum a student can earn during term time before his grant is reduced.

Mr. Brooke: A maximum of £400 earned during term time in respect of any year.

Iranian Students

47. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will assist Iranian students who no longer receive grant aid from their Government and who are unable to return to Iran to continue their studies.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has no funds at his disposal from which such assistance could be given.

Expenditure

48. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the change, in real terms, of education spending per secondary school pupil and primary school pupil since 1979.

Mr. Dunn: The average net expenditure per pupil, in real terms, shows an increase of 14 per cent. for primary and 11 per cent. for secondary schools during the period from 1979-80 to 1982-83, the latest year for which complete data are available.

General Teaching Council

49. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he supports the establishment of a General Teaching Council.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am aware that there is support among teachers for legislation to establish a teaching council which would enable the profession to become more self-regulating, but so far the profession itself has been divided on substantial issues concerning the functions and composition of such a body. Before I could consider supporting the establishment of a council, I would need to receive proposals from the interested parties which commanded wide agreement, and which were designed to protect the interests of the consumer as much as those of the producer.

Local Authority Expenditure

51. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications of Cmnd. 9428 for local authority capital spending on education.

Sir Keith Joseph: In the light of overspending on all services in 1983-84 there has been some reduction, as compared with previous plans, in provision for local authority capital spending on education for the years 1985-86 to 1987-88.

Present plans should allow authorities to continue with policies for the removal of surplus school places and to give continuing priority to meeting equipment needs in local authority further and higher education.

Voluntary Schools, Liverpool

52. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the provision of funds for repairs to reorganised schools in the voluntary sector in Liverpool.

Mr. Dunn: As the hon. Member is aware, my right hon. Friend regards repairs which are required to bring the newly established Roman Catholic secondary schools in Liverpool up to the requirements of the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981 as an integral part of the work required to implement the proposals made under section 13 of the Education Act 1980 under which the schools were established. Such works are eligible for grant aid under section 1 of the Education Act 1967 and have to be met from within the annual allocation made for approved projects undertaken by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools. An allocation of £2·08 million has been made for such projects in Liverpool in 1985-86, mostly for projects arising from Roman Catholic secondary reorganisation.

School Closures

53. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with procedures for appeal against school closures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the statutory procedures provide sufficient opportunity for the views of the proposers and of local objectors to be fully taken into account before proposals are decided. Advice on the operation of the procedures is set out in circulars 2/80 and 2/81, and most recently in administrative memorandum 4/84.

Science Budget

55. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total science budget for 1984-85; and how this compares, in cash terms and real terms, with the science budget for 1978-79.

Mr. Brooke: The total science budget for 1984-85 is £550 million compared with £296 million for 1978-79. This represents an increase in cash terms of 86 per cent. or an increase in real terms of 4·5 per cent.

School Attendances

56. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with teachers' organisations about school attendances.

Mr. Dunn: None recently. But the Department intends, in the very near future, to consult the local authority and teacher associations and other interested organisations about the issue of a circular on the role of the education welfare service and improved school attendance.

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

57. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Sir Keith Joseph: This is a general issue which is being considered interdepartmentally.

Special Education

58. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications of Cmnd. 9428 for special education provision.

Mr. Dunn: Provided cost increases can be contained the Government's plans provide, in the great majority of authorities in aggregate, for some improvement in the special school pupil-teacher ratio in 1985-86 compared with 1982-83, and for the level of non-teaching services per pupil to be maintained at the 1982-83 level.

Primary School Teachers (Computer Skills)

59. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average length of time which teachers in primary schools have spent in training to teach computer skills.

Mr. Dunn: Under the Department of Trade and Industry's micros in primary schools scheme, each school was supplied with a microcomputer, ancillary equipment and a self study pack designed to provide some 20 hours of instruction. A school was also required to provide two teachers for one or two days' training which was carried out by the LEA. Some teachers have also received additional training from their LEAs or from the microelectronics education programme primary unit. I regret, however, that it is not possible to supply a figure for average length of training overall.

Youth Unit

60. Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps have been taken to establish the youth unit announced on 11 July 1984, Official Report, column 1036; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I expect to make an announcement about this soon.

Scientific Research

61. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications of Cmnd. 9428 for scientific research.

Mr. Peter Brooke: The plans set out in Cmnd. 9428 include provision for an additional £45 million over the next three years for scientific research funded through the research councils, the Royal Society, and the Fellowship of Engineering; and through the University Grants Committee. The additional resources for the research councils and so on—£11 million in 1985-86 and £8 million in each of the two following years — will primarily be used for capital equipment, restructuring and to fund more top quality research proposals from universities. The advisory board for the research councils has said that the additional funds will broadly maintain the present level of funding for the science Vote in 1985-86.

The additional resources for the universities — £4 million in 1985-86 and £7 million in each of the two following years—are to help to equip some of our most highly regarded university researchers to the highest standards.

Higher Education

62. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his Department's revisions of the estimates of student demand for places in higher education.

Mr. Brooke: Revised projections of future demand for higher education based on final data for 1983-84 were contained in the letters that my right hon. Friend sent to the chairmen of the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body on 30 January. Copies have been placed in the Library. The revised projections are slightly higher than variant Y in "Report on Education 100."

67. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Board with a view to closer collaboration in the planning of future higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In his published letters to the chairmen of the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body of 30 January my right hon. Friend has welcomed the continued development of co-operation between the two bodies and stressed its importance to the future planning of higher education.

Student Unions

63. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further representations he has received about the automatic membership of students' unions.

70. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet made a decision on whether to make membership of student unions voluntary.

Mr. Brooke: Since I answered my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) on 12 February at column 114, my right hon. Friend has continued to receive representations from hon. Members and student organisations. As I informed the House then, the Government propose to consult higher education interests about student unions. In reaching their decisions they will take into account the representations they have received.

Teachers (Appraisal System)

64. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made in his proposals for an appraisal system for teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) and for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson).

Secondary Education (Expenditure)

65. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current average expenditure per secondary school pupil in English local authorities; what is the lowest figure; and what is the highest.

Mr. Dunn: The average net expenditure in 1984-85 on a secondary school pupil in England is estimated to be £1,100. The range of costs is from £950 to £1,860.

Capital Expenditure (Leicestershire)

66. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will reconsider the education element of the 1985-86 prescribed capital expenditure to Leicestershire.

Sir Keith Joseph: As I informed Parliament on 10 January at column 526 in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), I have retained a small reserve largely against the possibility of any local education authority being able to demonstrate that the reduction of the prescribed proportion of capital receipts will make it impossible to fulfil contractual or statutory obligations. It is open to Leicestershire to send me its case for assistance from this reserve.

Polytechnic Students

69. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the change in the number of polytechnic students over the last five years; and what are the forecast numbers for the next five years.

Mr. Brooke: The total number of students in polytechnics in England and in each of the last five years was as follows:

Year November	Number
1979	199,500
1980	202,100
1981	213,600
1982	220,800
1983	231,900
1984*	237,800

* Provisional.

The national advisory body for public sector higher education has set targets for 1985-86 for advanced work only, which imply a 3·3 per cent. increase in full-time equivalent student numbers in polytechnics compared to 1984-85. Plans for subsequent years have yet to be determined.

Adult Education

71. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current level of provision of adult education classes.

Mr. Brooke: In November 1983, course enrolments at local authority adult education and youth centres totalled 1,628,000; and there were 276,500 enrolments for courses provided by responsible bodies (university extra-mural departments and WEA districts) during the academic year 1982-83.

Universities and Polytechnics

72. Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students are now in universities and polytechnics; and how this figure compares with that for 1979.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 558,000 full-time and part-time students at universities in Great Britain and polytechnics in England compared with 522,000 in 1979. These figures exclude the Open University and the university of Buckingham which do not come under the University Grants Committee.

School Meals

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils have received free school meals in each of the past six years; and what proportion of the total school population these figures represent.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 30 January 1985, at column 191.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Cautioning Practices

Mr. Mark Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to bring about greater consistency in police cautioning practices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In June 1984 my right hon. and learned Friend published a consultative document "Cautioning by the Police". This document contained a report of a working group of chief officers of police and Home Office officials; a draft circular and guidelines to

Family Income

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will update the answers to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) of 6 February 1984, Official Report, columns 439-42 and 15 February 1984, Official Report, columns 203-4, concerning income statistics, to show net earnings at the lowest decile, median and highest decile of the earnings distribution for each year since 1978 for different household types, using constant April 1984 prices; and whether he will also give the same information for the following additional household types: (a) a married couple with two children, where one partner works full-time and the other part-time and (b) a married couple with both partners in full-time work;

(2) if he will publish an index in the same manner as his answer of 5 April 1984, Official Report, columns 631-32, about taxation changes and the related earlier answer, for tax changes for each group from 1978-79 onwards, and in the case of a married couple, where both partners are working, giving the information at multiples of one half, one third, one, five and 10 times the average earnings.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

EC (Budget Contributions)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money was required from each of the 10 member countries of the European Economic Community arising from the intergovernmental agreement to top up the EEC budget for 1984; which of the 10 countries have completed these payments; whether a similar intergovernmental agreement is expected for 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: The contributions of each member state are set out in Cmnd. 9395, Treaty Series No. 80(1984). All member states have now paid their agreed contributions. Council discussions are continuing about the best way of financing Community expenditure in 1985.

EC (Own Resources Payments)

Mr. Tracey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about an advance of own resources payments to the European Communities in February.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has, in accordance with article 10(2) of Council Regulation 2891/77, invited member states to advance from 20 March to 20 February payments of own resources other than VAT in respect of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties collected by the Government on their behalf in January. The Government are complying with this request.

The advance will reduce the Commission's current cash flow difficulties and enable the Commission to meet its commitments for payment, including those to United Kingdom recipients.

Pending Parliamentary approval of a spring supplementary estimate, payment of £125 million will be made by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund. The payment of levies and duties on 20 March 1985 which is made directly from the consolidated fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972 will be reduced by the amount of the advance. Forecast public expenditure is not therefore affected.

Customs Staff and Posts

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers of customs staff at seaports, airports and inland premises in Scotland in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 292]: The information required for other than the last two financial years ending 31 March 1985, is not recorded separately. Moreover there have been numerous changes both in Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom customs administration during the period in question. The figures appearing below for the first three years listed have been derived from applying percentages, which are kept historically, to the total customs staff at seaports, airports and inland premises in the United Kingdom. The last two years show the approved complement.

Year ending 31 March	Staff
1981	496
1982	480
1983	470
1984	439
1985	440

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what level per week child benefit could be raised if both (a) it were taxed and the proceeds of taxation were allocated to raising its level and (b) the married man's tax allowance were reduced to the rate of a single man's for men below retirement age and the savings allocated to raising the levels of child benefit.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 592]: If the changes had applied in 1984-85, and on the assumption that the wife's earned income allowance could not be set against child benefit if it was brought into tax, the increase in child benefit would have been about £10 per week. It has been assumed that scale rates of supplementary benefit for dependent children would also have been increased by a similar amount.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 19 February 1985

PRIME MINISTER

Higher Education

Q45. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister when she expects the age participation rate for higher education to reach 22 per cent.

The Prime Minister: The number of students currently in higher education is an all-time record. Future projected demand based on final data for 1983-84 implies an age participation index rising to 15·5 per cent. in 1997, compared with 13·5 per cent. in 1983-84 and 12·6 per cent. in 1979-80. The public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) reaffirms the Government's objective of maintaining access to higher education for those who want it and are suitably qualified.

Limited List Prescribing

Q56. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister how many direct representations she has received concerning the Government's proposals to limit the drugs which doctors may prescribe on the National Health Service.

The Prime Minister: I have received about 600 such representations.

British Airways

Q73. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will consider deferring the Government's decision to privatise British Airways for at least two years; if she will invite Lord King to remain as chairman and Mr. Colin Marshall to remain as chief executive; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It remains the Government's policy to privatise British Airways as soon as practicable in the next financial year. The Government have every confidence in the present chairman and chief executive, and both their appointments cover this period.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Skeet asked the Prime Minister whether she proposes to transfer responsibility for the Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate from the Health and Safety Executive to the Department of the Environment; and how many representations have been received on this issue.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so. A number of representations on this issue have been received recently by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Employment, Environment and for Wales; and by the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission.

Local Authority Finance (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister how much money in cash terms the Government have made available to each local authority within the Greater Manchester county area in each year since 1979.

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) on 28 January 1985, at columns 26-34.

Public Expenditure (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to assess the impact of Government spending in Greater Manchester since 1979 on the quality of life of people who live there.

The Prime Minister: The impact and level of Government spending is kept under constant review.

Plutonium Production

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister (1) pursuant to her answer of 15 February, if there has been a change in Her Majesty's Government's policy on the gradual termination of the production of plutonium for military purposes since the statement made by the then Prime Minister Lord Home of the Hirsel as he is now is, on 21 April 1964, Official Report, column 1098;

(2) when she expects the production of plutonium for military purposes to be terminated finally as envisaged by the then Prime Minister on 21 April 1964, Official Report, column 1098.

The Prime Minister: There has been no change in Her Majesty's Government's policy on the production of plutonium for defence purposes, which is that it is kept at the minimum required to meet defence needs.

Defence plutonium production was stopped for a period subsequent to the then Prime Minister's statement on 21 April 1964 and following the fulfilment of defence requirements. There has been one subsequent period of

European Community (Budget Rebates)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the projects, and the money spent on them, arising from the payment of the United Kingdom European Economic Community budget rebate in 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The refunds paid out of the 1983 and 1984 Community budgets related to the United Kingdom's excessive contributions to the Community in 1982 and 1983 respectively. They supported the following projects:

Tax Inspectors

Mrs. Peacock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the fall in the number of tax inspectors due to voluntary resignations.

Mr. Moore: The number of tax inspectors who left the Inland Revenue due to voluntary resignation in 1984 and in recent years was as follows:

	1984	1983	1982	1981
Fully-trained inspectors	61	22	20	18
Trainee inspectors	26	16	14	11
Other inspector grades	52	20	16	21
Total	139	58	50	50

The total number of inspectors of taxes at 31 December 1984 was 6,421 compared with 6,343 at 31 December 1983.

National Insurance Surcharge

Mr. Richard Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer approximately how many additional jobs are estimated to have resulted from the abolition of national insurance surcharge to the nearest convenient date.

Mr. Moore: No such estimate can sensibly be made. But the abolition of NIS, and the other business tax changes in the last Budget, lessen discrimination against the employment of labour, and so are bound to be helpful to jobs.

Value Added Tax

Mrs. Peacock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many claims by do-it-yourself housebuilders for refunds of value added tax under the provisions of Customs and Excise notice No. 719 were met in whole or in part during the years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of claims by do-it-yourself builders for refund of value added tax paid in the years specified were:

	Number
1982	7,519
1983	7,712
1984	8,743

Investment Income

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the loss of tax revenue if the investment income of husband and wife were taxed independently is attributable to persons over retirement age.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of creating a personal tax allowance at current levels for wives drawing a retirement pension based on their husbands' contributions.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Construction Industry

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he will not meet the group of eight representing the construction industry.

Mr. Lawson: While I recognise the group of eight's concern about the level of public expenditure on construction, I believe the group's main channel of communication with the Government should be through my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction. I understand that the Secretary of State for the Environment will be meeting representatives of the group of eight on 25 February. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury will also be present.

Inland Revenue (Staffing)

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contingency instructions his Department has given for essential staffing levels in Inland Revenue offices in the event of an emergency leading to the need to introduce power cuts.

Mr. Moore: In an emergency, departmental standing instructions require all officers in charge to designate certain staff as essential consistent with the aim of trying to maintain the flow of money to the Exchequer and a service to the public. As a general rule, not more than 20 per cent. of staff should be so designated. Adequate levels of emergency heating and lighting for essential staff are provided by the Property Services Agency.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer given on 10 December 1984, Official Report, columns 372-4, concerning changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions, if he will publish a similar index for the same household type at an increased level of half the average earnings.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Norfolk Broads

Mr. Weetch asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Offical Report details of the statutory powers under which he has agreed to provide half of the cost of the experimental livestock support scheme for the Norfolk Broads, as outlined by the Secretary of State for the Environment on 30 January, Official Report, column 179.

Mr. Jopling: Parliamentary approval will be sought in the 1985-86 Supply Estimates for provision of £220,000 to cover my Department's contribution to this experimental scheme. Provision will be sought under the sole authority of part I of the Estimates and of the confirming Appropriation Act, and no payment will be made until the Act has been passed.

Pesticides

Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidance he issues on the use of pesticides in the public health and industrial field for the control of food poisoning organisms, microbial contamination and the transmission of pathogenic organisms.

Mrs. Fenner: The distribution and use of pesticides in the public health and industrial fields is regulated at present by the non-statutory pesticides safety precaution scheme in the same way as agricultural pesticides. Recommendations for safe use on each product are agreed by nine Government Departments and agencies acting together, including the Agricultural and Health Departments, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in view of the identical nature of some of the active ingredients used in pesticides and in animal health products sold or supplied under the Medicines (Exemptions from Restrictions on the Retail Sale or Supply of Veterinary Drugs) Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1861), where he approves or co-operates with a scheme for the listing of both premises and of qualified personnel, he now intends to introduce similar measures under the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords].

Mrs. Fenner: The Food and Environment Protection Bill, if enacted, will be implemented through regulations. The Government have, in the drafting of clauses 15(2)(d) and (e), provided powers to impose conditions on a wide range of activities in the pesticides sector including sale or supply. Interested parties will be consulted on the scope and content of these regulations at the appropriate time.

EC (Food Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much European Economic Community surplus food and grain was shipped to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and other Eastern bloc countries in each month of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: Prior to 1984, data on Community trade for individual months are not readily available in the detail necessary to provide the information requested. Monthly figures are available for the first three months of 1984 and these are as follows:

1984 ('000 tonnes)

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total quantity of grain currently in intervention stores (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the rest of the European Community; and what is the cost to United Kingdom taxpayers of each of those stocks.

Mr. MacGregor: A note giving the most recent figures on the level of stocks of cereals and other agricultural products held in intervention in the United Kingdom and in the Community as a whole was deposited in the Library on 13 February. The cost to the United Kingdom taxpayer of the stocks of cereals currently held in intervention cannot be assessed because it depends on how long those stocks remain in store and at what prices they are sold.

Milk Quotas (Outgoers Scheme)

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many producers have now decided to go out of production under the milk outgoers scheme; and whether more are to be invited to join the scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: By 15 February, 1,297 producers in England and Wales had undertaken to surrender 166·5 million litres of quota in a full year. Last week we sent further invitations to another 290 producers with up to 500,000 litres each. As individual producers take their decisions about whether or not to go out of production we may need to replace those who drop out. In preparation for this we are now writing to all those larger producers who have not yet been invited to join the scheme, to ask them to indicate definitely whether they still wish to join. By the end of March all those with a continued interest in the scheme will be given a firm indication as to whether or not they can surrender their quota as outgoers.

TRANSPORT

Driving Tests

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the current waiting time for driving test applications before receiving their test in (a) each English region, (b) nationally, (c) west Yorkshire and (d) the Huddersfield area; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker The information for the 18 January, the latest date for which full information is available, is as follows:

	"L" Test Waiting Period (Weeks)
(a) Traffic Area
North Eastern (Newcastle)	6½
North Eastern (Leeds)	18½
North Western	9½
West Midlands	15½
Eastern (Nottingham)	12
Eastern (Cambridge)	14
South Wales	12¼
Western	11¾
South Eastern	14½
Scotland	11½
Metropolitan London	20½
(b) National	15
(c) West Yorkshire	21
(d) Huddersfield Driving Test Centre	18

I am concerned about the length of waiting periods generally. The backlog of test appointments has arisen mainly because of a much higher than forecast demand for tests coupled with a temporary shortage of examiners. Additional examiners have already been trained, and more are being recruited in order to reduced delays.

Road Passenger Services

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received on his policy relating to the organisation of road passenger services.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since my answer to the hon. Member on 1 February, at column 339, I have received several hundred further letters, many of them based on a complete misinterpretation of the Government's proposals.

British Rail (Customer Communication)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of the British Railways Board, he will raise the standard of the Board's communications with its customers.

Mr. David Mitchell: If my hon. Friend has a specific point of concern about the Railway Board's communications with its customers I will be glad to draw it to the attention of the chairman.

Aerial Spraying

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends meeting representatives of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the further regulation of aerial spraying companies.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall be meeting the chairman of the authority shortly to discuss a number of matters, including aerial crop-spraying. My Department has been fully involved in the authority's review of the procedure which operators must follow, and the authority intends to bring into force strengthened and more precise rules before the beginning of this year's crop spraying season. My Department will closely monitor the impact of these measures.

Bitumen (Costs)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of the higher sterling price of bitumen on the ability of his Department to carry out on schedule and within budget trunk road projects.

Mrs. Chalker: The price of bitumen is only one among many factors which influence the overall cost of trunk roads. To date, however, tender prices have remained very competitive and do not prejudice our ability to carry out projects on time and within the cash limit. Indeed, at 1 February, 40 per cent. of our major contracts were running ahead of schedule.

M20 (Hollingbourne to Ashford)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total amount spent on design, testing, preparation and soon of the M20 motorway Hollingbourne to Ashford section to date.

Mrs. Chalker: Following are the costs to date:

Design fees	752,000
Surveys and testing	294,000
Side road strengthening	113,000
Other expenses	12,000
	1,171,000

Staff and other costs in the period up to 1980 when detailed design was undertaken by the Department's Kent sub-unit are not available.

M11 (Fog)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will undertake a study of the M11 to identify any stretches of that motorway liable to fog.

Mrs. Chalker: I am having a survey carried out of all motorways in service, including the M11, to identify stretches which are prone to fog.

Transport and Road Research Laboratory (Reports)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a list of places where Transport and Road Research Laboratory reports are available for public reference.

Mrs. Chalker: Transport and Road Research Laboratory reports are available for public reference in the four national libraries:

The British Library
The National Library of Scotland
The National Library of Wales
The Bodleian Library

They are also available from the central library of the Department of Transport and from the library of the laboratory to bona fide enquirers.

The laboratory's reports have also been supplied widely to university, professional, local authority, industrial and some public libraries throughout this country and overseas.

M25 (Land Purchase)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much was paid by his Department for land at the M25/M1/A405 interchange; and how many acres are now available for sale.

Mrs. Chalker: The purchase price is a matter between the vendor and the Department. Approximately 42 acres of Department-owned land are now available for sale.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chile

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out in the Official Report, chronologically, the timings and substance of negotiations with Chile about the sales of goods to Chile, since April 1982.

Mr. Renton: Negotiations by the private sector over the sales of goods to Chile are a matter for the individual firms concerned. It has not been the practice of this or previous administrations to make public the details of negotiations over the sales of goods by the Government.

Sellafield (Nuclear Safeguards Inspectors)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has received any representations either from British citizens or Ministers of foreign Governments on the barring of nuclear safeguards inspectors from the Magnox reprocessing line at Sellafield by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Luce: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received no such representations. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy said in answer to the hon. Gentleman's question to him on 18 February, at column 353, discussions on the implementation of safeguards at Sellafield are under way.

Arms Reduction Talks (Vienna)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the 34th session of the mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna; and what is the latest position in these negotiations.

Mr. Luce: There is no significant progress to report from the 34th round of the mutual and balanced force reductions talks in Vienna. Unfortunately the East continues to reject all Western efforts to resolve differences between the sides over the existing level of Eastern forces. We shall of course study carefully the East's 14 February proposal. But at first sight it seems to amount to little more than a repackaging of part of its 1983 proposals.

UN Decade for Women

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will appoint the British delegation to the United Nations end of Decade for Women's conference; and what criteria he will use in selecting the members of the United Kingdom's delegation to the conference.

Mr. Renton: We hope to announce the composition of our delegation shortly. But the delegation will include people familiar with the ground to be covered at the conference and the views of interested British organisations. The delegation will be well able to represent the views expressed by such organisations.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ensure that the membership of the British delegation to the United Nations end of Decade for Women's conference reflects fully the interests of British women.

Mr. Renton: We intend to include in our delegation a number of people familiar with the views of a wide range of interested organisations and individuals. We have also made arrangements whereby interested organisations and individuals can put their views to the Government so that these views can be taken into account in the preparations for the conference.

Women (Elimination of Discrimination)

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will make an announcement on the United Kingdom's ratification of the International Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on 17 January at column 209-10, we are still considering this convention in the light of our existing legislation and hope to be in a position to make an announcement about ratification soon.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reviews have been undertaken by his Department on the separation of employment offices from benefit offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: These arrangements are primarily a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, and no specific review has been undertaken in this Department. However, the joint Department of Employment and Department of Health and Social Security study of "Payment of Benefits to Unemployed People" (of which the report was published in 1981) looked, inter alia, at the results of the separation of employment and benefit services, found that they had been generally satisfactory, and made no proposals for change in this respect.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if any products on his proposed limited list will fall into the category of having licence of right.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. About half the medicines in the proposed list have product licences of right. These are mainly vitamins, antacids and antitussives: all well-established and widely used remedies. As part of our Department's review programme, these will be subject to review under the Medicines Act in the next few years. However, the great majority of analgesics, sedatives and tranquillisers on the list have already been reviewed and now have full product licences.

The proposed list must of course be regarded only as a basis for consultation. We are currently considering the composition of the final list and expect to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made in considering his proposals for a draft limited list of the extent to which clinically similar generic products can vary widely in size, shape and colour.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 5 February at column 525.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to allow general retailers in remote areas to sell medicines not included in the limited list to be introduced in April.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Under the Medicines Act 1968, medicines not on a general sale list are allowed to be sold only in pharmacies, under the professional supervision of a pharmacist, and this restriction must be maintained in order to protect the consumer. Medicines which are on a general sale list will be obtainable from general retailers.

General Manager (Swindon)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be able to make an announcement of the appointment of a general manager for the Swindon district health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The responsibility for such announcements lies with individual district health authorities. Regional health authorities are, however, required to let me have their recommendations on district health authority proposals and to take account of my views before decisions are taken and announcements made.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report such information as he has on the level of provision by national health services in other industrialised countries of assistance with the provision of hearing aids; and how this compares with provision in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton: Information on the provision of hearing aids in other countries is not held in the Department but I understand that some information is given from time to time in the Hearing Aid Journal, copies of which are held in the library of the Royal National Institute for the Deaf. In this country hearing aids provided under the National Health Service are issued on free loan and expenditure on the standard range in England totalled £10·5 million in the financial year 1983-84.

Hay Fever Vaccine

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the current price being paid by the National Health Service for a set of three vials of graded strength, together with a supply of disposable syringes and needles, for the hay fever vaccine, details of which have been supplied to him by the hon. Member for Brent, South;

(2) if, in considering payment for the hay fever vaccine, details of which have been sent to him by the hon. Member for Brent South, under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme full account is taken of a 20 per cent. discount offered to dispensing doctors and the cost of special sessions organised by general practitioners at which representatives of the manufacturers give injections.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The current National Health Service list price is £27·95. Our officials will shortly discuss with the company concerned the treatment under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme of the alleged 20 per cent. discount and the cost of the special sessions.

Barking Hospital

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will call for and publish a report from the Redbridge district health authority on the strike of domestic staff at Barking hospital; and if he will instruct the authority to seek to refer the matters to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Redbridge health authority has already received and discussed at its public meetings innumerable oral and written reports on the dispute at Barking hospital over the past year. We see no need to call for an additional report on the dispute. I understand that the health authority has already sought and obtained the assistance of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service on a number of occasions.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of persons referred to each of his Department's 23 resettlement units during (a) the four-week period ended 18 December 1984 and (b) the four-week period ended 13 March 1984 from each of the following sources: (i) hospitals, (ii) local authorities, (iii) police/probation services, (iv) voluntary organisations, (v) other resettlement units, (vi) his Department's local offices and (vii) self referrals.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of people referred to the Department's 23 resettlement units from the sources shown during the four week periods up to 18 December 1984 and 13 March 1984 are given in the table.

Supplementary Benefit (Awards)

Mr. Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table to show the total sum of money paid out in supplementary benefit awards to claimants at his Department's offices serving the Heywood and Middleton area for the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available.

Pensioners

Mr. Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he publish in the Official Report a table to show the number of pensioners living in the area served by the Middleton district office of his Department who are currently in receipt of supplementary benefit and those who received benefit in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The figures for pensioners receiving supplementary benefit from the Middleton local office are as follows:

Year of December	Number
1984	3,075
1983	3,062
1982	3,385
1981	3,301
1980	3,278
1979	3,266

Sick Babies (Transfer)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of time for transferring sick babies, including newly born, to specialist hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The requested information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Glyn Risely

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now reply to the letter sent to him on 17 November 1984 by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) regarding Mr. Glyn Risely, 56 Summerland Lane, Caswell, Swansea, a constituent of the hon. Member for Gower.

Mr. Whitney: I replied to the hon. Member on 12 December. I am sending him a copy of my reply.

Drugs (Safety)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps the Committee on the Safety of Medicine takes to ensure that all test data is reviewed before clearance of a drug.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chiselhurst (Mr. Sims) on 29 January at column 161-62.

Brain-damaged Patients (Rehabilitation)

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take to meet the demand for rehabilitation of people who have survived brain injury due to the application of high technology medicine.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The needs of these patients are not easy to determine in terms either of their numbers or of the combination of rehabilitative services which they require. We are currently considering what steps might be taken to encourage health authorities to improve where necessary their services for brain-damaged patients who often present particular behaviour and other problems.

Rivermead Rehabilitation Centre

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he approves of the proposed reduction in the service offered at Rivermead rehabilitation centre from 30 to 20 beds.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Oxford regional health authority's proposals for the future size and location of the Rivermead rehabilitation centre are shortly to be put to full and formal consultation. It would not be right to prejudge the matter in advance of that consultation.

NHS Property (Security)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 28 November 1984, Official Report, column 523, what is the total cost of all those measures taken to improve security of National Health Service property; and what is (a) the number of persons engaged in each of these initiatives and (b) the number of extra personnel recruited to carry out these examinations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not able to identify specifically the manpower used and the costs incurred by our Department and by the health authorities on these initiatives.

Hexafluorosilic Acid

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if hexafluorosilic acid has ever been submitted to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

AIDS

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures are currently taken to ensure appropriate staffing, both for treatment and counselling, at haemophilia treatment centres, in the light of the current situation regarding acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The staffing levels of haemophilia treatment centres are a matter for individual health authorities to determine in the light of their other priorities. We are urgently considering what advice to give to health authorities concerning AIDS-related counselling including the needs of haemophiliacs.

Factor VIII

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies the National Blood Tranfusion Service has undertaken into the economics of self-sufficiency in factor VIII; and if the results are to be published.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We decided in 1982 that this country should become self-sufficient in blood products. This will eliminate the health risks attached to the use of imported commercial products derived from blood provided by paid donors.

In order to achieve self sufficiency in England and Wales it was decided to redevelop the Blood Products Laboratory at Elstree. An economic appraisal of this project demonstrated that this policy would be cost effective. This appraisal was prepared for internal purposes and is not in a form which others would find helpful without the addition of further explanatory and background material.

Doctors (Dispensing)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the total income received by general practices in the United Kingdom from the dispensing of National Health Service prescriptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 15 February 1985, c. 318.]: Information is not available for the United Kingdom. In 1983-84 for the supply of drugs and appliances in Great Britain the gross income from the taxpayer (excluding the cost of drugs) received by general medical practitioners was £21,247,000 of which £20,173,000 was received by dispensing doctors. Additional income was received by doctors from the varying levels of discount on the drug cost offered to them by wholesalers and manufacturers.

SCOTLAND

Rate Support Grant (West Lothian)

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of representations he has received on the rate support grant to West Lothian.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has received 65 letters and about 1,200 printed postcards provided for residents by West Lothian district council.

Salmon Fishing

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with procedures for the quinquennial reassessment of rates for rod salmon fishing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The fixing of new valuations with effect from 1 April for salmon fishings, as for other rateable subjects, is the responsibility of the assessor for each area. Assessors have to take account of statutory provisions; if any person is dissatisfied with his valuation he will, of course, have the opportunity to appeal against it to the local valuation appeal committee. I understand that the assessors' arrangements are well in hand.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any powers for directing regional water authorities' spending of additional income derived from the increase of rates for rod salmon fishing.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has no such powers.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Younger: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand in my Department, following the publication on 8 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Fluoridation

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has received from the Chief Medical Officer and from the medical and dental professions about the addition of fluoride to water.

Mr. John MacKay: There is a well-established convention that Ministers do not disclose the advice which they receive from their officials. It has, however, been the firm policy of successive Governments for over two decades that the fluoridation of the public water supply is a safe and effective means of promoting good dental health; and this policy has had the strong support of all the main medical and dental professional organisations.

Home Loans

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the amount of home loans granted by housing authorities in Scotland to public sector tenants in each of the past years for which figures are available since 1981.

Mr. Ancram: The table shows the amount of loans granted to private persons for the purchase, or purchase and improvement, of public sector houses. The fall in the amounts over the years quoted reflects the increasing proportion of public sector house purchase financed by private sector mortgages.

Amount of loans granted

£ million

Financial year	Local authorities	*New Towns	*SSHA
1981-82	10·97	11·88	7·26
1982-83	10·82	2·43	2·50
1983-84	6·35	4·14	0·39

* Purchase only.

Returns have not been received from Western Isles, Clydebank and West Lothian for 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84; Annandale and Eskdale for 1981-82, 1983-84 Tweeddale, Falkirk, Stirling and Bearsden and Milngavie for 1982-83, 1983-84; Inverness and Dumbarton for 1981-82; Strathkelvin for 1982-83; and North East Fife, Gordon, Badenoch and Strathspey, and Dundee for 1983-84.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the amount of arrears outstanding on mortgage payments due by tenants in the public sector buying their houses in each of the past years for which figures are available since 1981.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is not held centrally.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish more details about the public expenditure figures in table 3.15 of the White Paper, "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9828).

Mr. Younger: My Department is today issuing a commentary on the Scotland public expenditure programme which gives more information about the public expenditure within my responsibility. I have arranged for a copy to be sent to all right hon. and hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies and I shall be pleased to let any other hon. Member have a copy on request. Copies are also being placed in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Civil Servants (Personal Records)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) why the equal opportunities unit of the Department of Finance and Personnel is asking civil servants to declare which primary or preparatory school they attended;

(2) if he has authorised making available confidential information in civil servants' personal files to the equal opportunities unit of the department of finance and personnel; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) on 4 December 1984 at column 97.

Staff who have not returned the questionnaire on primary schools attended are being sent reminders which indicate that it may be necessary as a last resort to seek the data on their personal files. In that event the personal file would be consulted by the officer's own personnel division, not by the equal opportunities unit.

Sex Monitoring and Positive Action

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has prepared plans for the implementation in his Department of the recommendations for sex monitoring and for positive action, respectively, for the purpose of providing equal opportunities in his Department in accordance with the recommendations contained in the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Dr. Boyson: In respect of the Home Civil Service, arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are in hand.

In respect of the Northern Ireland Civil Service, arrangements have been made to introduce the monitoring and other action promulgated in the Northern Ireland Civil Service equal opportunities policy statement, copies of which were placed in the Library on 4 December 1984.

Job Creation

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many local enterprise development unit-supported companies in Northern Ireland reached their targets in job creation ahead of the projected plans submitted and approved by local enterprise development units in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Dr. Boyson: Information on client companies of the local enterprise development unit which reach job creation targets ahead of schedule is not maintained separately and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Terrorism

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many persons have been killed by terrorist actions in Northern Ireland in each year since 1 January 1970;

(2) what has been the number of terrorist incidents in each year since 1 January 1980.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Kilroot Power Station

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has concerning the Northern Ireland electricity service's progress with their plans to convert Kilroot power station to coal.

Dr. Boyson: I shall be making an announcement about the future of Kilroot power station in due course.

THE ARTS

Arts Council and National Theatre

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what has been the increase in real terms since 1979 in the grants to the Arts Council of Great Britain and to the National Theatre.

Mr. Waldegrave: The increase in these grants in real terms since 1978-89 (measured against the GDP deflator of 86·2 per cent.) has been, respectively, 15·3 per cent. and 13·6 per cent.

Local Authority Investment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what levels of investment have been allocated by individual local authorities towards activities in respect of the Arts (a) in London and (b) in the West Midlands county in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 12 February 1985, c. 139]: Capital expenditure by individual authorities in London and the west midlands on their museum and art gallery services for the years 1978-79 to 1983-84 is set out in the table. This is based on returns made by the authorities to the Department of the Environment. Details of their capital expenditure on other arts activities are not separately identifiable. The budget estimates of individual authorities for current expenditure on the arts are published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in "Leisure and Recreation Statistics Estimates", copies of which are in the Library.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what proportion of the Church Commissioners' assets, since the debate in Synod in July 1982, has been withdrawn from companies trading in South Africa; and what this sum represents for each year, expressed as a proportion of the commissioners' portfolio in commercial companies.

Sir William van Straubenzee: It is not possible to say what proportion of the many millions of pounds of investments sold by the commissioners since July 1982 were in respect of companies trading in South Africa. It is, however, the commissioners' policy not to invest in companies operating wholly or mainly in that country.

PRIME MINISTER

Caribbean (Aircraft Purchase)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if, in her next discussion with the Heads of Government of the European Economic Community, she will insist on a full investigation into the Commission's decision not to support the Governments of the Eastern Caribbean, the Caribbean Development Bank and Leeward Islands Air Transport in their wish to purchase Super 748 aircraft; whether she is satisfied that the Commission's decision in this matter accords with responsibilities under the Lomé convention; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government have asked the European Commission to make public its reasons for rejecting the view of the Leeward Islands Air Transport that the Super 748 offer from British Aerospace best fulfilled the procurement criteria of the Lomé convention. When we receive the Commission's reply we shall consider what further action is required. Meanwhile LIAT is making other arrangements to finance the purchase of the aeroplanes it requires, and we have offered support from the aid and trade provision for the purchase of Super 748s.

WALES

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report details for the latest available period of the average equated rate poundage in respect of unmeasured water supply for the Welsh water authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The equated rate poundage in respect of the unmeasured water supply charge for the Welsh water authority for 1984-85 is 37·80p.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC (Non-tariff Barriers)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated cost of non-tariff barriers to trade within the European Community.

Mr. Channon: There are a number of published estimates of the cost of non-tariff barriers to trade as a whole within the European Community, though these have concentrated mainly on the costs incurred at border crossings. In particular, I refer my hon. Friend to the following publications which are available from the Library:

— European Commission Communication of the State of the Internal Market (COM(81)313)—June 1981.
— House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities, Session 1981-82, 17th Report — Internal Market—July 1982.
— "Towards European Economic Recovery in the 1980s"— Report presented to the European Parliament by Mr. M. Albert and Prof. R. J. Ball—July 1983.

They put the cost at around 12 billion ecu pa (roughly £7 billion).

Industrial Assistance (Heywood and Middleton)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further steps he is undertaking to assist industry in the Heywood and Middleton constituency.

Mr. Trippier: As a result of the recent review of regional industrial policy the travel-to-work areas covering the constituency now have intermediate area status and industry there is therefore eligible for selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. In addition, that part of the constituency which was in the old Bury TTWA (Heywood) is eligible for assistance under the ERDF non-quota funds for closure areas, which were announced by my hon. Friend the Minister of State on 26 November last year.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the adoption by the United Kingdom of clause 9 of the United Nation's Food and Agriculture Organisations's proposed international code on the use and distribution of pesticides.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Textile Producers (Aid)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the decision by the EEC Commission not to sanction Her Majesty's Government's £20 million aid package to small textile producers.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I received preliminary notification on 15 February that the Commission had decided not to approve the clothing and footwear and textiles scheme. In discussions with the Commission I have repeatedly made it very clear that I would strongly disagree with a negative decision, and that in my view it Because of the difficulties of defining "new equipments", the Department no longer analyses expenditure on this basis.

Harriers

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force Harriers are currently being ordered by the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Lee: Contracts which provide for the development and production, collaboratively with the United States, of a total of 60 Harrier GR5 aircraft, were let in September 1981 and December 1983. There are also four Harrier GR3s and four two-seat Harrier trainers (T4s) on order for the RAF.

Alert Signs

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the difference between the state of alert signs bikini amber and bikini black alpha recently displayed at the Territorial Army barracks in Liverpool, Riverside.

Mr. Lee: It is not our practice to comment on detail on the differences between particular alert states applying to the armed forces.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimated cost of the plant being constructed for British Nuclear Fuels Limited at Capenhurst.

Mr. Lee: It has been the long standing practice of successive Governments not to disclose cost information of this nature.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. plant at Capenhurst to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The plant to which the hon. Member refers is the enrichment plant referred to in the then Secretary of State for Defence's statement in June 1982 at columns 128-29. Construction is on schedule and expected to be completed this year.

Classified Information

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what classification the papers from his Department sent by Mr. Ponting to an hon. Member carried; what are the normal reporting procedures observed in his Department when such information is discovered to have passed to a person whom his Department regards as being unauthorised to receive it; and what reporting procedures there are for notifying officials and Ministers in other Departments, including Law Officers;

(2) when officials in his Department first became aware that papers from his Department had been passed to an hon. Member; when Ministers in his Department first were informed that papers from the Department had been passed to an hon. Member; when officials in his Department first informed officials in any other Department that papers from his Department had been passed to an hon. Member; and when he or other Ministers first informed anybody in other Departments, including the Law Officers' Department, that papers from his Department had been passed to an hon. Member.

Mr. Heseltine: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he was first made aware that a leak of official information from his Department had taken place during the summer of 1984; how this information was communicated to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I assume the hon. Member is referring to events which led to the recent trial of Mr. Clive Ponting.

I was advised orally by the Chairman of the House of Commons Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on 26 July 1984 that what appeared to be copies of official documents had been passed to him by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he was first made aware that the papers relating to a leak of official information in his Department in the summer of 1984 had been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions; how this information was communicated to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I assume the hon. Member is referring to events leading to the recent trial of Mr. Clive Ponting.

The second permanent under-secretary of state advised me orally on the afternoon of 13 August 1984 that the matter had been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. Clive Ponting

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he was first made aware that his Department's police had identified Mr. Clive Ponting as the person suspected of having leaked official information from his Department in the summer of 1984; how the information was communicated to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The second permanent under-secretary of state informed me orally on the afternoon of 13 August 1984.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he first was made aware that a prosecution was to be brought against Mr. Clive Ponting in respect of an alleged leak of official information from his Department; how this information was communicated to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I was first informed officially, by means of a minute from my private office, on my return from a holiday in Cyprus on 28 August 1984. I was, however, aware that a prosecution was to be brought against Mr. Ponting from reports in the media while I was on holiday.

Reforger Exercises

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the United States army units training in Britain during the recent Reforger exercises; and whether those units have been trained in the airland battle doctrine.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 15 February 1985, c. 317]: The two United States army units to which I referred in my reply to the hon. Member on 21 January at column 323, comprised two companies from the 4th Mechanised Infantry Division and one company from the 197th Infantry Brigade. They undertook routine infantry training using Ministry of Defence facilities at Catterick and Longmore. The training of United States forces in relation to airland battle doctrine is a matter for the United States Government.

Remotely Piloted Vehicle

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is any nearer reaching a decision on the remotely piloted vehicle for the British Army.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to the reply, 12 February 1985, c. 142]: A contract for the development and production of a remotely piloted vehicle known as Phoenix has now been awarded to GEC Avionics.

RAF Basic Trainer

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what advice he has received from the Royal Air Force concerning the new basic trainer;

(2) whether he proposes to accept the advice of the Royal Air Force in his choice of the new basic trainer.

Mr. Lee: I am awaiting the evaluation of the revised offers received from the four suppliers, to which members of the Royal Air Force are naturally contributing. The needs of the Royal Air Force will, of course, be fully taken into account in reaching a decision.

RAF Molesworth

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's intentions with regard to the building known as the peace chapel at RAF Molesworth.

Mr. Heseltine: The structure known as the peace chapel at RAF Molesworth is a half constructed building erected on Ministry of Defence land without permission. My Department has no record of its having been accorded any official religious status. We have not decided what to do about this building.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Local Authority Mortgages

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the effect would be on (a) the money supply and (b) the public sector borrowing requirement if the funds currently lent on first mortgages by local authorities were transferred with the borrowers' consent to building societies or other approved financial institutions in the following sums in each respect (i) £1 billion, (ii) £2 billion, (iii) £3 billion and (iv) £4 billion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: Providing other expenditure does not increase, then transferring local authority mortgages to the building societies or other approved financial institutions would reduce the public sector's borrowing requirement. The effect on the money supply would depend on the response of those who took on the mortgages, but it is likely that monetary conditions in the economy would be very little changed. If public expenditure did increase in line with the transfer of mortgages, then the PSBR would revert to its original level, but because monetary conditions had been largely unaffected by the initial fall in the PSBR this increase would imply some loosening of financial conditions, and would thus be inflationary unless offset by higher interest rates.

Unit Costs

Mr. Parris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the movement in United Kingdom unit costs, including non-wage factors such as employers' national insurance contributions, on a common currency basis compared with the United States of America, Canada, Japan, West Germany, France and Italy between 1975, 1977 and 1979, respectively, and the present day, extrapolating the cost trend in national currencies apparent over the last two quarters for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the estimated full-year yield of income tax would be reduced if the tax threshold for a married man in a one-earner household were raised to equal the normal supplementary benefit maximum assuming two school age children.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer given on 10 December 1984, Official Report, columns 372-74, concerning changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions, if he will publish a similar index for the same household type at an increased level of half the average earnings.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 18 February 1985, c. 403]: The table shows income tax plus national insurance contributions less child benefit, where appropriate, as a percentage of gross earnings, for a married man on half average earnings whose wife has average earnings for part-time women. Assumptions are those specified in my earlier reply.

chief officers on the cautioning of both juveniles and adults; and a summary of research conducted into police force cautioning policy and practice.

The consultative document was given wide circulation, and comments on it were received from agencies and individuals working in the criminal justice field.

The draft circular and guidelines have been revised in the light of comments received. The revised circular and guidelines were issued to chief officers of police yesterday. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

We are grateful to chief officers of police for their co-operation in taking this work forward and to all the organisations and individuals who offered their observations on the consultative document. We look to the new guidelines to help bring about more consistent and effective cautioning practices and have asked Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary to pay particular attention to this in their inspection of forces.

Prevention of Terrorism

(Temporary Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will seek the renewal of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to the reply, 15 February 1985, c. 296]: Copies of Sir Cyril Philips' report have been placed in the Library of the House and in the Vote Office. My right hon. and learned Friend will respond to it very shortly.

WALES

Council Housing

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the figures for major repairs to council housing in Wales from 1979 to date; and what is his estimate for the year 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on expenditure on repairs alone is not available, but the following table gives the expenditure since 1979-80 by local authorities on conversions, repairs and improvements of housing revenue account stock carried out under section 105 of the Housing Act 1974. No estimates are available for 1985-86.

Skillcentres (Closure)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many skillcentre places will be lost in Lambeth, Waddon and Deptford as a result of the proposed skillcentre closure programme of the Manpower Services Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission proposes to support training for around 4,400 adults in south-east London in 1985-86, compared with around 3,200 in 1984-85 and to increase provision further the following year. This will lead to a slight increase next year in the amount of training business commissioned from skillcentres in the area, with a further increase forecast for 1986-87.

The skillcentre training agency's proposals in south-east London envisage retaining Deptford skillcentre, opening a new centre in Lambeth, and closing the skillcentre at Waddon, its annexe at Sydenham and the young persons training centre in Lambeth.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the change in numbers of people employed in each local authority area in Greater Manchester in each year since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information on employment in local areas is from the June 1978 and the following September 1981 census of employment. Net

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many job losses have been notified to his Department occurring in each local authority district in Greater Manchester in each year since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information, relating to confirmed redundancies, is given in the following table:

Pesticides

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that untrained operators will not be allowed to use potentially harmful pesticides in the fields of public health and industrial pest control.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Section 2 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 already places a duty on employers to provide such informtion, instruction, training and supervision as is necessary to ensure, as far as is reasonably practicable, the health and safety at work of their employees. The Act also places a duty on employers and the self-employed to ensure that people other than employees are not exposed to risks to their health and safety. The Health and Safety Commission has issued for public consultation a draft approved code of practice on fumigation operations, which includes detailed guidance on training.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that premises used for the storage, sale or supply or pesticides will be required to conform to specific standards in order to minimise the risk of public hazard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Section 2(2)(b) of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 places a duty on employers to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, safety and the absence of risks to health in connection with the use, handling, storage and transport of articles and substances.

The Government are currently considering the need for specific measures to be taken under part III of the Food and Environmental Protection Bill, at present before Parliament.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that all firms engaged in the supply and use of pesticides are listed and known to the appropriate enforcing authorities.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government are currently considering the need for specific measures to be taken under part III of the Food and Environmental Protection Bill, at present before Parliament.

Pest Control

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that adequate and recognised training courses are available to the pest-control industry and for all operators employed by commercial servicing companies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am satisfied that adequate training courses are already available and are widely recognised in the industries concerned.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the present expected profile of expenditure on Trident; and if he will express the estimated expenditure in each year as a percentage of (a) total projected defence spending and (b) the projected new equipment budget.

Mr. Butler: It is not the practice to give cost profiles for projects on a year by year basis. Trident, over its procurement period, will account on average for about 3 per cent. of the defence budget and about 6 per cent. of the equipment budget, rising to 6 per cent. and 11 per cent., respectively, for the peak years of the programme.

	District	Police officers assigned* as at 31 December 1983 per 1,000 offences recorded in 1983
X	Ealing and Hillingdon	31
Y	Haringey and Enfield	30
Z	Croydon, Sutton, etc.	27

* Officers assigned to the royalty and diplomatic protection department and the central traffic department have been excluded from the calculations; those assigned to a district but allocated to traffic duties are included.

Political and Religious Asylum

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the number of people from India who have been given (a) political asylum and (b) asylum on religious grounds in the United Kingdom during the last five years;

(2) what is the number of people from Pakistan who have been given (a) political asylum and (b) asylum on religious grounds in the United Kingdom during the last five years.

Mr. Waddington: Statistics are not kept of the particular grounds on which asylum is granted. The following table shows the total number of nationals of India and Pakistan granted asylum in the United Kingdom, for whatever reason, in the last five years:

	India	Pakistan
1980	Nil	18
1981	Nil	39
1982	Nil	44
1983	Nil	14
1984	Nil	7

Mr. Clive Ponting

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the dates on which Mr. Clive Ponting was interviewed by police; and if any officers of the Metropolitan police special branch were involved at any time.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that no Metropolitan police officers were involved in the investigations which led to the bringing of charges against Mr. Ponting. The only involvement of the Metropolitan police was in making administrative arrangements for Mr. Ponting to be questioned and subsequently charged by the Ministry of Defence police at Cannon Row police station on 17 August 1984.

Extradition

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the proposed consultative document on extradition.

Mr. Brittan: The consultative document (Cmnd. 9421) is published today and copies have been placed in the Library of the House. It discusses and seeks views on a number of proposals for the reform of extradition law. Comments are invited by 30 April on the matters covered in the document. These should be addressed to the Home Office, E5 Division, Room 426A, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1H 9AT.

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made with appointments to the new Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Brittan: I am glad to announce that the right hon. Roland Moyle and Rear-Admiral John Bell have accepted my offer of appointment as the full-time deputy chairmen of the new authority. They will take up their duties when the authority is established.

Sir Cecil Clothier has already agreed to serve as chairman.

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will seek the renewal of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan [pursuant to his replies, 15 February 1985, c. 296, and 19 February 1985, c. 427]: Copies of my response to Sir Cyril Philips' first report have been placed in the Library of the House and in the Vote Office.

ENERGY

Electricity Consumers (Rebates)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has held consultation with (a) the London Electricity Board and (b) any other electricity board concerning rebates to low use customers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Area boards determine their own tariffs, following consultation with their consumer councils.

Coal Boiler Conversion Scheme

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much grant aid has been given to how many projects under the coal boiler conversion scheme for each of the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. David Hunt: Grants made under the coal firing scheme are normally paid in stages over two years or more. The following table shows the total number of projects accepted for grant-aid under the scheme in each year, and the actual amounts paid out each year.

	Projects accepted	Amounts of grant paid £ million
1981	20	0·05
1982	82	1·01
1983	127	3·82
1984	94	6·72
Total	323	11·60

Coal Liquefaction Project

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of the coal liquefaction project.

Mr. David Hunt: The National Coal Board has now begun work on the construction phase of the Point of Ayr coal liquefaction pilot plant. Detailed engineering design is now in progress, and procurement has begun for key plant items. Site work is expected to begin later this year and a main contractor is scheduled to be appointed at about the same time. The pilot plant is expected to be completed in 1987.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Brazil

5. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has plans to visit the Brazilian trade exhibition or the Brazilian embassy.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so, but I attended the reception given by His Excellency the Brazilian ambassador to mark the opening of the exhibition.

Mr. Sam Nujoma

6. Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during his recent visit to Southern Africa, he met Mr. Sam Nujoma, president of the South West Africa People's Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend did not meet Mr. Nujoma during his recent visit.

South Africa

12. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to discuss with the United States Government, United States policy toward South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: We regularly exchange views with the United States on Southern African issues. These may well be discussed during the visit my right hon. and learned Friend is paying to the United States at present.

14. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will make further representations to the South African Government about the decision of the South African Cabinet to renege on its agent's undertaking to return the South African citizens charged with offences under customs legislation for trial.

18. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has taken any action to seek to ensure the appearance in court of the four South African citizens charged with offences under customs and excise legislation further to the statement by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) in the House on 23 October.

Mr. Rifkind: The South African Government are in no doubt about our views on this matter. We shall continue to remind the South Africans at every opportunity that we expect them to honour the undertaking they gave to the court to ensure the return of the four defendants to stand trial.

17. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the continuing non-compliance of the South African authorities with their pledge to the British courts that the four South African citizens charged with offences under customs legislation would return to stand trial, has had any effect on United Kingdom bilateral relations with South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: The failure of the South African Government to comply with their undertaking to return the four men inevitably remains an obstacle to better relations with South Africa.

22. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of relations with South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: We have full diplomatic relations with South Africa. These are necessary to protect our major interests there and to make known to the South African authorities our views on matters of concern to us.

South Africa (UDF Trial)

13. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government intend to send observers to the UDF treason trial in South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: We are very concerned at the arrest of a number of UDF leaders. Although we do not yet have full details of the trial, we expect to be sending an observer.

55. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any representations have been made to the South African Government concerning the trial on charges of high treason of eight South Africans including the six men who sought sanctuary in the British consulate in Durban.

Mr. Rifkind: No. As is our normal practice, we shall consider the possibility of representations only when the legal processes have been completed.

Namibia

15. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Namibia following his recent visit to Southern Africa.

24. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, if he will report on the latest negotiations on Namibian independence under United Nations resolution 435.

Mr. Rifkind: Discussions are continuing between the United States, Angola and South Africa in an effort to achieve an agreement on Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola which will enable implementation of Security Council resolution 435. During his recent visit to Southern Africa, my right hon. and learned Friend urged other Governments in the region to support these negotiations, which offer the best prospect of progress towards Namibian independence.

23. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to attend a meeting of the Contact Group of Namibia; and what subjects he expects to raise.

Mr. Rifkind: There are at present no plans for a meeting of the Contact Group on Namibia, but we remain in close touch with our Contact Group partners over developments in the current negotiations towards a Namibia settlement.

Disarmament Negotiations

16. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement of Her Majesty's Government's policy on the re-opening of disarmament negotiations between the United States of American and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Luce: We welcome United States and Soviet agreement to begin negotiations in Geneva on 12 March on the whole range of space and nuclear arms. We fully share the objective of these negotiations which is to work out effective agreements aimed at preventing an arms race in space and reducing nuclear arms, and at strengthening strategic stability.

46. Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's latest assessment of the prospects for the forthcoming United States and Soviet Union disarmament talks in Geneva.

Mr. Luce: The Geneva talks represent a fresh opportunity for progress in arms control. We hope they will lead to agreement limiting and reducing nuclear weapons in the intermediate and strategic categories. We are also pleased that the talks will cover ways of preventing an arms race in outer space. As President Reagan has said, the negotiations will require patience and perseverance.

International Terrorism

19. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on international measures against terrorism taken since the economic summit in London.

Mr. Renton: We have maintained close contacts with our economic summit partners. We played a leading role in concluding the Ten's agreement on terrorism and are playing a full part in the continuing discussions in the Council of Europe. We are working closely with our partners to counter the current terrorist threat to NATO.

27. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to Governments in the middle east concerning the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards international terrorism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We take every appropriate opportunity to discuss the importance of combating international terrorism with other Governments. I have no doubt that our strong views on the subject are widely known.

76. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has recently notified all diplomatic missions in London of the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding terrorism and, in particular, of the attitude of Her Majesty's Government towards acts of terrorism in the United Kingdom involving groups of foreign nationals.

Mr. Rifkind: The text of the statement on international terrorism and the Vienna convention which I made on 18 July to the Foreign Affairs Committee was sent on 15 August to all diplomatic missions.

Acts of terrorism in the United Kingdom involving groups of foreign nationals are primarily matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Guatemala

20. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the resumption of diplomatic relations with Guatemala.

Mr. Renton: Consular relations were broken off unilaterally by Guatemala in 1981. Recently there have been discussions with the Guatemalan Government about a possible resumption of such relations but nothing has yet been decided.

Mr. Terry Waite

21. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has plans to meet Terry Waite, the Archbishop of Canterbury's special envoy to discuss recent visits to Libya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Mr. Terry Waite called on me on 11 February. I thanked Mr. Waite on behalf of the Government for the successful completion of his humanitarian mission in securing the release of four British citizens detained in Libya. I have nothing to add to the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) on 8 February at columns 750-52.

Sri Lanka

25. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with the Sri Lanka Government.

Mr. Renton: We enjoy close and friendly relations as befits fellow members of the Commonwealth.

70. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received an invitation recently to visit Sri Lanka.

Mr. Renton: The Sri Lankan Foreign Minister, during the meeting on 30 January, expressed the hope that my right hon. and learned Friend might visit Sri Lanka. However, my right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to do so.

Nicaragua

26. Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current level of British diplomatic representation in Nicaragua; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's ambassador to Costa Rica and the defence and assistant defence attachés resident in Mexico City are accredited to Nicaragua. A first secretary accredited to the ambassador's staff in Costa Rica also resides in Managua as chargé d'affaires ad interim.

Human Rights

28. Mr. Buchan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any representations have been made to the South African Government concerning human rights violations in Namibia or South Africa since 12 December 1984.

Mr. Rifkind: We have consistently condemned human rights violations in Namibia and South Africa and shall continue to do so. Since 12 December 1984 we have expressed concern to the South African Government about the arrest of Ms. Gwen Lister and made public statements about the alleged Koevoet atrocities and Archbishop Hurley's trial.

31. Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on human rights in Turkey.

Mr. Renton: We continue to take suitable opportunities to raise the question of human rights with the Turkish Government. My right hon. and learned Friend did so during his visit to Turkey from 11 to 13 February. They can be in no doubt as to our opinions and the importance we attach to progress in this area being maintained.

40. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the reasons for the abstention by the United Kingdom representative to the United Nations in votes concerning the human rights situation in Chile.

Mr. Renton; I have nothing to add to the replies given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 31 January at columns 293-94 to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes).

72. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made representations to the Iranian regime about human rights in Iran since the revolution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We have made clear to the Iranian Government on many occasions our concern at violations of human rights. We co-sponsored the United Nations Commission on Human Rights resolution on this question in March 1984. In addition, representatives of the European Community in Tehran have made a series of demarches on behalf of the Ten about the human rights situation in Iran, most recently on 2 October 1984.

Warsaw Pact (Negotiations)

29. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with Western European governments with a view to bilateral negotiations with individual Warsaw Pact countries.

Mr. Rifkind: We keep in close touch with Western European allies and partners on all aspects of the East-West relationship, including relations with individual Warsaw pact states. The discussions during the series of visits to Eastern European capitals by my right hon. and learned Friend will contribute to the East-West dialogue.

Afghanistan (Refugees)

30. Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimates his Department has made of the total number of refugees who have fled from Afghanistan as a result of the Soviet invasion of that country.

Mr. Renton: There are now up to 3 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan, and up to another 1 million in Iran. Those in Pakistan constitute the world's largest single concentration of refugees. Over one fifth of the population of Afghanistan have now fled that country. This is tragic testimony to the immense suffering inflicted by the Soviet invasion and a clear demonstration that the Afghan people reject the Karmal regime.

"The Central American Crisis: A European Response"

32. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has made to the recommendations of the document produced by the Transnational Institute, "The Central American Crisis: A European Response"; a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Renton: We believe that the Contadora process, rather than the selective approach put forward by the Transnational Institute, offers the best basis for a solution to central America's problems. The statement issued on 4 December by the European Council reiterated our strong and continuing support for the Contadora process.

Libya

33. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Libya.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my right hon. and learned Friend gave on 8 February, at columns 750-52, to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks).

British Embassies and High Commissioners

34. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received about the commercial work of British embassies and high commissioners abroad.

Mr. Rifkind: There has been increased interest and concern following my right hon. and learned Friend's answer of 18 December, at column 137, to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) in which he announced the closure of certain diplomatic service posts.

Lebanon

35. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, when he next meets his Syrian counterpart, he will seek to ascertain when that country's forces will leave the Lebanon.

74. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make representations to the Syrian Government about their continued presence in the Lebanon; and if he will seek an assurance that they will leave the Lebanon in the same manner as Israeli forces.

Mr. Luce: We keep in touch with the Syrian Government about regional issues, including Lebanon. We have consistently called for the withdrawal from Lebanon of all foreign forces whose presence is not authorised by the Lebanese Government. I understand that the Lebanese Government of national unity have not called for the departure of Syrian forces from Lebanon.

41. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in the Lebanon, following the recent Israeli withdrawal.

Mr. Luce: We welcome Israel's withdrawal from the Sidon area, and look forward to the early, complete and orderly withdrawal of all Israeli forces to the international border. We have repeatedly emphasised to all parties the need for agreed and effective security arrangements in areas to be vacated by Israeli forces with full consideration for the safety of civilians, and to ensure the full restoration of Lebanese Government authority throughout the area in question.

50. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any request either from the Lebanese Government or from the United Nations for either a British troop deployment or British logistical support for a United Nations international force in the Lebanon.

Mr. Luce: We have received no request for a British troop contribution to UNIFIL or any other United Nations force in Lebanon. We have provided logistic support to UNIFIL since its establishment in 1978.

East-West Relations

36. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on East-West relations.

Mr. Rifkind: We continue to work, with our allies, for a better relationship between East and West. We welcome the agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union to resume bilateral arms control negotiations. We recognise that it will take time to consider fully the complex issues involved, and that patience and realism will be needed. We hope that meanwhile increased contacts, both between the United States and the Soviet Union, and between other countries of East and West, will lead to a broader understanding on arms control and other problems; and to the mutual confidence that can, over time, provide the basis for lasting progress.

Western European Union

37. Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when is the next meeting of the Council of the Western European Union; and whether he will be present there.

Mr. Luce: The next meeting of the Western European Union Council will take place in the last week of April in Bonn. My right hon. and learned Friend plans to attend.

Ethiopia

38. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with Ethiopia.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on 23 January at column 967.

Space Weapons

39. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the extent of Soviet research and development into space weapons.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 29 January at columns 148-49. Soviet efforts in the field of research into space weapons, and in some cases development, are, as in all other areas of military research and development, extensive. The United States strategic defence initiative should be seen in the light of Soviet research into ballistic missile defence. The Soviet Union is alone in deploying an anti-satellite weapon and nuclear-tipped ABM missiles capable of destroying targets in space.

Sudan

42. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with the Sudan.

51. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the present relationship between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Sudan.

Mr. Luce: We have good relations with Sudan. There is a long and friendly association between our two countries. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development is at present visiting Sudan. We are proud of the contribution we have made to the economic development of that country and regret that this contribution may have been damaged by recent political and economic developments. As friends of Sudan we are doing all we can to help resolve her refugee and drought problems. We hope that the Sudanese authorities will take practical steps to resolve their difficulties peaceably and thus restore stability and prosperity to their country.

Stockholm Conference

43. Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest developments at the Stockholm confidence building measures conference.

77. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the progress of the Stockholm conference on security and co-operation in Europe.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made at the conference on confidence and security building measures and disarmament in Europe since the speech in Stockhom by the Minister of State, his hon. Friend, the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) on 13 September 1984.

Mr. Luce: In December agreement was reached on an agenda and timetable for two working groups. In this session — 29 January to 22 March — participants are circulating working papers on thier tabled proposals and more detailed discussion has begun. We welcome this and look forward to making progress on practical measures which would enhance confidence and thereby diminish the possibility of any future resort to force.

Central America

44. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to seek to visit states in Central America.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to visit Central America in the near future.

Venice Declaration

45. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he intends to seek to implement the objectives of the Venice declaration.

75. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on steps being taken to assist in achieving a peace settlement in the middle east.

Mr. Luce: The Heads of State and Government of the European Community reaffirmed in Dublin in December 1984 their desire to see urgent efforts made to establish peace and stability in the middle east, and their willingness to assist efforts to that end. With our partners we shall continue to do all we can to encourage a negotiated solution on the basis of a balanced approach which safeguards Israel's right to exist within secure and recognised borders and the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. But it must be for the parties themselves to take the initiative in peace efforts.

Test Ban Treaty

47. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are now taking to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 12 February 1985 at column 142.

Eastern Europe

48. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking to improve relations with the countries of eastern Europe.

Mr. Rifkind: We attach importance to the development of relations with the countries of Eastern Europe and we have a regular programme of political consultations. My right hon. and learned Friend had valuable discussions during his recent visits to Romania and Bulgaria and he is looking forward to further useful exchanges when he visits the German Democratic Republic, Czhechoslovakia and Poland from 8 to 13 April. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited Hungary in February 1984, and in March we shall welcome the Hungarian Foreign Minister Mr. Varkonyi to Britain. We also continue to work for closer cultural and commercial relations with the countries of Eastern Europe.

USSR (Postal Communications)

49. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek to raise the subject of postal communications between the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics with the Soviet Foreign Minister.

Mr. Rifkind: We have already made clear to the Soviet authorities our concern over several aspects of this subject which we find unsatisfactory. Most recently, the question of Soviet interference with mail from the United Kingdom to individuals in the Soviet Union was raised by our delegation to the universal postal union congress in Hamburg in July 1984. At that meeting the presidency also read out a statement by the Ten calling for an improvement in the Soviet record and clarification of its list of prohibited articles.

New Zealand

52. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to hold discussions with his counterpart in New Zealand on policy regarding relations in the South Pacific.

Mr. Renton: We are in continuing touch with the New Zealand Government on matters of mutual interest. The New Zealand Prime Minister will be visiting the United Kingdom at the end of this month and will call on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

South Africa (New Constitution)

53. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there has been a review of British policy towards South Africa's new constitution since the statement made as an explanation of vote on United Nations Security Council resolution 554.

Mr. Rifkind: We continue to regard the new constitution as seriously flawed by the absence of any provision for South Africa's black population. We have been encouraged by President Botha's speech of 25 January and hope that the ideas it outlines will be followed by major reforms affecting South Africa's black majority.

Arms Talks

54. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with the United States Government on the forthcoming arms negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We remain in the closest touch with the United States Administration on all such issues. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is having talks with President Reagan in Washington today. My right hon. and learned Friend will be holding separate discussions with Secretary Shultz.

65. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there have been any positive developments at the mutual and balanced force reduction conference at Vienna.

Mr. Luce: Until there is agreement on the existing levels of Eastern forces, real progress in Vienna towards parity at lower levels of conventional forces in central Europe is not possible. Unfortunately, the East continues to reject all Western efforts to resolve this key issue. We shall, of course, study carefully the East's 14 February proposal. But at first sight it seems to amount to little more than repackaging of part of its 1983 proposals.

66. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his United States counterpart in preparation for the 12 March nuclear arms talks; and if he has yet indicated to the United States Government Her Majesty's Government's view on President Reagan's stategic defence initiative.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang). As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 9 January, at column 441, the strategic defence initiative was discussed during her last meeting with President Reagan on 22 December.

Chemical Weapons

56. Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Geneva disarmament negotiations on chemical weapons.

Mr. Luce: The negotiations resumed on 15 January. Although agreement in principle has been reached on a number of less central issues, there has been no significant progress on key problems of verification. We intend to concentrate on these areas in 1985. We trust the Soviet Union will join us in showing the flexibility and determination needed to achieve a total ban.

Falkland Islands

57. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will extend the territorial limits of the Falkland Islands to 200 miles.

Mr. Renton: We do not recognise the legality of claims to territorial sea of a breadth of 200 miles.

Middle East

58. Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the role of the Soviet Union in the middle east.

Mr. Luce: A peaceful solution of the fundamental problem of the middle east, the Arab-Israel dispute, is in the interests of the whole international community. As a member of the Security Council the Soviet Union has an important contribution to make to a negotiated peace settlement.

78. Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the discussions held by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), during his recent visit to the Sultanate of Oman, he will make representations to the United States Government regarding peace initiatives in the middle east.

Mr. Luce: I had useful talks with His Majesty Sultan Qaboos and the Omani Minister of State for Foreign Affairs on 14 January. Our policy is to promote solutions to regional conflicts and the restoration of stability in the middle east. We are ready to support all sensible moves by the parties towards a just and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute and the Iran-Iraq conflict.

We keep in close contact with the United States on the middle east and make our views on this and other matters clear. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend will be discussing the middle east during their current visit to Washington.

Small States

59. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with other Commonwealth countries on the future of small states.

Mr. Renton: During the past year my right hon. and learned Friend and other Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers have taken every opportunity presented by visits to Commonwealth countries and the visits of Commonwealth colleagues to the United Kingdom to discuss the special needs of small states. My noble Friend Baroness Young led the United Kingdom delegation to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference last autumn at which this was an agenda item. We look forward to holding further discussions later this year when the Commonwealth Secretary-General presents the results of the special study commissioned by the Commonwealth Heads of Government at their meeting in New Delhi in November 1983.

UN Relief and Works Agency

60. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the work of United Nations Relief and Works Agency.

Mr. Luce: The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine refugees in the near east (UNRWA) does irreplaceable humanitarian work in the interests of peace and international stability. We are the second largest contributor to the agency overall since its inception, and our present national contribution of £5 million per annum taken with the European Community contribution of over $20 million per annum, are evidence of our continuing commitment to it.

Cyprus

61. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to meet the Secretary-General of the United Nations to discuss the situation in Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend saw the United Nations Secretary-General on 23 January. There are no immediate plans to meet him again.

Syrian Nationals (Deportation)

62. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the note verbale given to the Syrian charge d'affaires by his Department on 5 February relating to the deportation of Syrian nationals from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) on 8 February, at column 749.

Saudi Arabia (British Nationals)

63. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why British consular officials in Saudi Arabia failed to visit the British nationals who were recently flogged and imprisoned.

Mr. Luce: The Saudi Arabian authorities have told Her Majesty's embassy in Jedda that they intend to introduce a new system, including special identity documents, for visits to detainees by foreign consular staff. There has been a certain amount of confusion about exactly how the new system is to work, and for some weeks our consuls were unable to visit some British detainees. Her Majesty's ambassador and members of his staff have been in regular touch with the Saudi authorities about this unsatisfactory state of affairs, and ad hoc arrangements have been made, pending the introduction of the new system, for visits to all prisons in Saudi Arabia.

I assume the hon. Member is referring in his question to a group of four men who were not visited by our consul while in prison in Taif. A member of our consular staff was, however, able to visit them at the deportation centre in Jedda before they left the kingdom.

Yugoslav Ambassador

64. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has plans to meet the Yugoslav ambassador.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to do so, but naturally meets ambassadors from time to time in the course of normal diplomatic business.

USA (Strategic Defence Initiative)

67. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the United States' current strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 9 January at column 441.

Afghanistan

68. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in discussions with the Government of the Soviet Union concerning the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

Mr. Renton: This issue was most recently raised by my right hon. and learned Friend with Mr. Gorbachev who, regrettably, indicated no change in the Soviet position.

Commonwealth Foreign Ministers

69. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Foreign Ministers of Commonwealth countries to discuss matters of mutual Commonwealth interest.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to meet those Foreign Ministers who accompany their Heads of Government at the next Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting which is being arranged for the autumn and to meet some of them at the United Nations General Assembly.

Gibraltar

71. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect on the economy of Gibraltar of the opening of the border with Spain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As my right hon. and learned Friend said in his statment on 6 February, at column 937, the prospects for economic prosperity for the people of Gibraltar and the region have been substantially improved by the full opening of the border on 5 February.

Trident

73. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of article 1 of the non-proliferation treaty for the proposed acquisition, including design, of the Trident missile system from the United States of America.

Mr. Luce: We are satisfied that the acquisition of the Trident missile system is consistent with article 1 of the non-proliferation treaty. As the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the then right hon. Member for Sheffield, Park, (Mr. Mulley) told the House on 8 July 1968, at column 37, article 1 does "Not deal with the transfer of nuclear delivery vehicles, provided that there was no transfer of nuclear weapons or control over them".

Baha'is (Persecution)

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of Iran concerning the continued murder and persecution of members of the Baha'i faith in Iran; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We have made clear to the Iranian Government on many occasions our concern at the reports of the persecution of the Baha'is community in Iran. We co-sponsored the resolution on Iran at the 1984 session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which specifically referred to the Baha'is. In addition, representatives of the European Community in Tehran have made a series of demarches on behalf of the Ten about human rights in Iran in general, and the situation of the Baha'is in particular. The most recent such demarche was made on 2 October 1984.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government are satisfied that representations made to Iran concerning the persecution of members of the Baha'i community in that country have evoked a positive response; what further action Her Majesty's Government intend to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: As I made it clear to the House during the Adjournment debate on 21 December 1984, at column 749-52, we continue to take whatever action we judge to be most helpful to the Baha'i community in Iran, both in conjunction with our partners in the Ten or with other like-minded countries, and by taking a leading part in the United Nations. We naturally hope that our efforts are having a positive effect, though firm evidence is hard to obtain. The Baha'i community in Britain frequently express their appreciation of the Government's efforts.

Diplomatic Posts

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 137, if he will give details of the potential cost savings involved in the closure of diplomatic posts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 14 January, at column 41. Apart from this I have nothing to add to the answer of 18 December to which the hon. Member refers.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Spain and Portugal

84. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent progress has been made in the accession negotiations with Spain and Portugal.

Mr. Rifkind: The Community and Spain reached agreement on the arrangements for industrial tariff dismantling and Spanish steel restructuring at the ministerial conference on 18 December 1984. The customs union, external relations and European Steel and Coal Community chapters are now near conclusion with both Spain and Portugal.

Negotiations still continue between the Community and the applicants on agriculture, fisheries and social affairs.

Budget Discussions

86. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have been held at the Foreign Affairs Council concerning the financing of the 1985 budget.

Mr. Rifkind: The Foreign Affairs Council discussed the financing of the 1985 budget at its meeting of 18 to 20 February.

Priorities

87. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current priorities of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) gave to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) on 13 February, at column 203.

Financial Management

88. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, at the next meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council, he will raise the conduct of the financial management of the Community.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom is concerned to ensure sound financial management in all areas of Community activity. We shall continue to raise the issue as appropriate at meetings of the Council.

Farm Prices

89. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with European Economic Community Agriculture Ministers on the overall effect on European Economic Community expenditure of the proposed farm prices for 1985-86.

Mr. Rifkind: The expenditure implications of the agricultural price fixing proposals have been discussed separately by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in talks in recent weeks with most of his Community colleagues and at meetings my right hon. and learned Friend has had with Community Foreign Ministers.

Fontainebleau Agreement

90. Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the benefits to the United Kingdom of the Fontainebleau agreement.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

Own Resources

91. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to discuss the increase in own resources at the Foreign Affairs Council.

Mr. Rifkind: At the Foreign Affairs Council on 18 and 19 March.

93. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he now expects the increase in EEC own resources to take place.

Mr. Rifkind: The conclusions of the Fontainebleau European Council stipulate that the new maximum VAT rate of 1·4 per cent. will enter into force as soon as the ratification procedures are completed and by 1 January 1986 at the latest. Discussion in the Council centres on how best to fulfil that requirement.

World Poverty and Arms Purchases

92. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with other European Economic Community Foreign Ministers regarding world poverty and arms purchases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Developmental issues are dealt with at ministerial level at meetings both of the Development Council, which are normally held twice a year, and of the Foreign Affairs Council and at the European Council. The most recent example was the discussion on the famine in Africa at the European Council on 3 and 4 December 1984, which resulted in the Community's pledge to supply 1·2 million tonnes of grain to the worst affected countries. Neither the Community nor the Ten discuss arms purchases.

Policy Development

94. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he intends to place before his European Community partners for the development of Community policies.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 23 January, at column 444.

Dublin Summit

95. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the implementation of the decisions reached at the Dublin summit.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend on 23 January, at column 979, to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd).

Integrated Mediterranean Programmes

96. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent discussions at the Foreign Affairs Council regarding the integrated Mediterranean programmes.

Mr. Rifkind: The January Foreign Affairs Council held an informal exchange of views on integrated Mediterranean programmes, during which the President of the Commission outlined his ideas on how the issue should be resolved. The Council is now waiting for a new formal proposal from the Commission.

ENVIRONMENT

Gipsies (Definition)

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the definition of gipsies in section 16 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Macfarlane: The definition in section 16 was examined by Sir John Cripps in his 1976 report on the working of the Caravan Sites Act 1968. He was unable to suggest any improvement.

More recently, my Department last year carried out a detailed study of this question. The resulting report, entitled "Defining a Gypsy" — a copy of which was placed in the Library—again reaffirmed the appropriateness of the existing definition.

GLC (Staff)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the Greater London council's budget is spent on staff costs; and what is the average cost per staff member.

Sir George Young: The information requested is not available from the Greater London council's budget. Based on the latest complete outturn information received from the Greater London council (in respect of 1982-83), and information supplied to the Joint Manpower Watch, employee costs accounted for 16½ per cent. of gross revenue expenditure, and the average cost per staff member was about £10,500.

West Midlands Structure Plan

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations from the west midlands on the stability of planning in green belts under the west midlands structure plan.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes, there have been representations from various organisations and individuals expressing concern about the green belt. However, a recent study by Solihull MBC has shown that the green belt policies have largely succeeded in preventing speculative developments.

Water Authorities

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing, for each of the regional water authorities in England, the target return on capital required for 1984-85, the corresponding return for 1985-86, the relevant figures for capital employed for each authority for such a calculation, and the cash value of the change in revenue surplus required between the two years to meet the change in target return on capital.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information requested is as follows:

Water Authority	Financial Target*		‡Net Assets		‖Change in Surplus
	1984-85 Per cent.	1985-86 Per cent.	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million	£ million
North West	0·95	1·43	4,147	4,452	24·3
Northumbrian	1·25	1·48	1,541	1,638	¶na
Severn-Trent	1·25	1·47	4,490	4,776	14·1
Yorkshire	1·00	1·43	3,197	3,428	17·1

Mr. MacGregor: If we make any proposals for the nutrition labelling of foods we shall consult representatives of all organisations that appear to be substantially affected by the proposals. This would include representatives of health consumer organisations.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food with which health consumer organisations he is undertaking research in regard to nutritional labelling.

Mr. MacGregor: In conjunction with the Consumer's Association and the National Consumer Council, we have commissioned a survey by professional market research companies into consumer's attitudes towards and understanding of various formats of fat and nutrition labelling of foods. The results of this survey are expected in May.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on which consultative bodies relating to nutritional labelling his Department is represented; and with what status.

Mr. MacGregor: With my colleagues I appoint members to the Food Advisory Committee and my Department provides the administrative and technical secretariat. One of my officials has observer status at the meetings of the Joint Advisory Committee on Nutrition Education.

SCOTLAND

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total National Health Service expenditure per head of population in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Gross public expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland in 1984-85 is expected to be £369 per head of population.

Salmon

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has plans to commission future research into the declining numbers of salmon returning to Scottish rivers in general and the River Tweed in particular.

Mr. John MacKay: Extensive research into the factors affecting levels of juvenile salmon production and returning adults is already carried out by the staff of the freshwater fisheries laboratory of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. I understand that the Tweed Foundation has commissioned a survey of the salmon and trout stocks of the Tweed basin from the department of forestry and natural resources of the University of Edinburgh and that a report will be published shortly.

Limited List Prescribing

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date notification of the Government's proposals for limited list prescribing was sent to doctors in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for health and social work in Scotland wrote to the British Medical Association's Scottish office on 12 November 1984 explaining our proposals for limited list prescribing and my Department's Chief Medical Officer wrote to all Scottish doctors about the new measures on 14 December 1984.

Rents (Orkney and Shetland)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications to the rent officer for assessment of rents in (a) Shetland and (b) Orkney had still to be determined on 1 September 1984, 1 December 1984 and 1 February 1985.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of applications still to be determined at
	1 September 1984	1 December 1984	1 February 1985
(a) Shetland	26	28	29
(b) Orkney	—	1	1

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the dates when the rent officer visited (a) Shetland and (b) Orkney in 1984 to determine applications for assessment.

Mr. Ancram: The rent officer visited Shetland in July 1984. He last visited Orkney in December 1983 since when only one application for registration of a fair rent has been received, in November 1984.

Drug Misusers

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to provide additional funds to support projects concerned with the treatment and rehabilitation of drug misusers.

Mr. Younger: In April 1984 I announced that £1·5 million was being made available over a period of three years to provide financial support for local initiatives concerned with the treatment and rehabilitation of drug misusers. Some 13 projects were accepted for grant.

I now consider that it would be appropriate to provide additional funds to secure an expansion of these services, and offers of grant totalling over £500,000 over a four-year period have been made to the sponsoring bodies in respect of the following six projects.

Sponsors	Project	Cost in First Year £
Church of Scotland	Residential centre at Tynepark, Haddington for rehabilitation of drug misusers	30,000
Joint Voluntary Organisations Addiction Project, Ayr	Day centre in Ayr for advice and counselling of drug misusers and their families and rehabilitation service	62,000

Sponsors	Project	Cost in First Year £
Tayside Health Board	Transfer of drug misuse project from Ninewells Hospital to a day centre in Dundee	28,000
Strathclyde Regional Council Social Work Department	Detached worker with drug misusers, Gorbals, Glasgow	11,500
West Lothian Council of Social Service	Information, education and counselling service based in Livingston	42,000
Drug Problem Resource Group	Residential centre at Kilmahew House, Cardross for rehabilitation of drug misusers	40,000
	Appointment of two social workers	22,000

The variety in the schemes being supported has been extended by the inclusion of two projects providing residential facilities. Grants will be payable over a three year period, after which we would expect successful projects to be funded locally. A sum of £100,000 is also being set aside in each of the next three financial years to provide grants under the provisions of section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 for drug misuse projects sponsored by voluntary bodies, from which £22,000 has already been offered to the Drug Problem Resource Group.

The total planned expenditure by the Scottish Office in support of projects to assist drug misusers will now amount to around £2 million during the period from 1984-85 to 1987-88. This expenditure will make a significant contribution in the provision of services to assist drug misusers.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Iranians (Intimidation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received alleging that Iranian groups in the United Kingdom are being intimidated by Iranian supporters of the Khomeini régime; and what response he has made.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have not received recently any representations making general allegations of this sort, although a number of applications for political asylum from Iranians have expressed individual fears of intimidation. Such applications are considered sympathetically.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the representations he received on the discussion document on immigration appeals.

Mr. Waddington: Yes, if those who submitted comments on the document, and whom we are consulting about the hon. Member's suggestion, wish us to do so.

Reconviction Rate

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in the Official Report the reconviction rate within two years for offenders given (a) community service orders, and (b) custodial sentences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The information available is published in "Reconvictions of those given Community Service Orders" (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 18/83) and in chapter 8 of "Prison Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9363). Copies of both these publications are in the Library of the House. In comparing reconviction rates, it needs to be remembered that the main factors related to subsequent reconviction (sex, age on conviction, the number of previous convictions and the type of offence) are also likely to have influenced the sentence of the court.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police are engaged in each Metropolitan police district expressed in terms of police per numbers of recorded crimes per annum and excluding police engaged on diplomatic, traffic and similar duties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the latest available information is for 1983 and is given in the following table. The number of officers assigned to districts who were deployed on traffic duties could be excluded from the calculations only at disproportionate cost.

Number of police officers assigned per 1,000 notifiable offences recorded by district, 1983*
Metropolitan Police District

District		Police officers assigned* as at 31 December 1983 per 1,000 offences recorded in 1983

would be inequitable in view of the large amounts of sectoral aids given to these industries in other member states. When the full text of the Commission's decision becomes available I shall wish to study it carefully in close consultation with representatives of the industries concerned.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

British Council

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what contact his Department has with the British Council about its experience in the teaching of English as a second language overseas and the relevance of this experience to the teaching of English as a second language in maintained schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Department is in constant contact with the British Council. However, the council's experience of teaching English overseas is as a foreign language, where the objective is to furnish the student with a knowledge of English adequate for specific, limited purposes. English as a second language provision in maintained schools aims to equip children with a fluency in the language equal to all the social and academic demands made on them in school and, later, as adults fully participating in British society. It follows that the teaching of English as a foreign language has only limited relevance to English as a second language provision in this country.

Colleges of Education

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total annual cost of publicly financed colleges of education; and what is the cost of teacher training for each student.

Mr. Dunn: The estimated annual cost of providing an initial teacher training place in 1982-83, the latest year for which full information is available, was £2,950 (at 1982-83 prices). This is an average figure covering courses of various kinds in both the universities and the public sector. There were some 32,000 students in initial teacher training in 1982-83. Students taking in-service or other teacher training courses not leading to qualified teacher status, and the cost of such courses, are not included in the figures. Most teacher training, initial and in-service, is now provided in multi-faculty institutions: the information available to the Department does not allow the full costs of such training to be separated from other costs in those institutions.

School Meals

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, of those local authorities which provide school meals, if he will indicate which authorities also provide alternative meals for children who are in need of special food.

Mr. Dunn: LEAs make some provision for special dietary requirements in school meals where the diet is required for medical reasons. Detailed information on this is not collected centrally.

Teachers (Advisory Committee)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the decision not to reconstitute the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers at the end of its five-year term.

Mr. Dunn: None.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for the implementation of the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers concerning the number of new teachers and intake to initial training; what analysis has been made of the cost of the proposals concerning intake to initial training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, is currently considering the advice submitted by the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers on the future demand for primary and secondary teachers and on future levels of intakes to initial teacher training. Decisions on the size and broad shape of the initial training system from 1986 will be announced as soon as possible taking into account all relevant factors including resource implications.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers, with the estimated cost of implementation and his Department's response to each recommendation.

Mr. Dunn: During its five-year term the committee has submitted 10 substantial reports and some shorter pieces of advice to my right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. Some of the recommendations contained in those reports have been of considerable significance for subsequent policy decisions. Owing to the number and scope of the recommendations, however, a full answer to the question cannot be given without disproportionate cost. I shall send the hon. Member copies of the committee's reports and of the responses made so far by my right hon. Friends.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Monetary Compensatory Amounts

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government accepts the desirability of the abolition of monetary compensatory amounts procedures at European Community frontiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Monetary compensatory amounts are necessary to avoid trade distortions arising when market rates of exchange diverge from the special green rates used for the common agricultural policy. The Government accept that over time it is desirable for green rates to be adjusted to take account of underlying exchange rate developments, so that producers in all member states are supported at the same real price levels. But the specific timing of such changes must be decided in relation to all relevant economic considerations.

Veterinary Investigation Centres

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will detail the annual savings which he expects to be achieved by the closure of the Itchen Abbas veterinary investigation centre;

(2) in the event of the closure of the Itchen Abbas veterinary investigation centre from what source or sources the veterinary practices and veterinary surgeons currently using the centre would obtain a comparable service;

(3) what additional costs would be involved in terms of relocating staff or travelling expenses if the work currently undertaken by the Itchen Abbas veterinary investigation centre was to be taken on by other centres.

Mr. Jopling: The report of the study of the veterinary investigation service, to which I have referred in answer to earlier questions, is being considered in my Ministry. No decisions on the future of individual centres will be taken until the report has been made public and there has been opportunity for consultation with all the interests concerned including consideration of the points raised by my hon. Friend.

EC (Trace Elements Directive)

Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends raising the question of the European directive on trace elements with the Commission; or what other steps he intends taking to obtain uniformity of application.

Mrs. Fenner: The European Commission has under discussion at a technical level with member states proposals for a directive on the composition and labelling of liquid fertilisers and the labelling of trace elements in all fertilisers. United Kingdom officials are participating in those discussions which should ultimately lead to a proposal to the Council.

Dairy Quotas

Mr. Watson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is currently engaged in any discussions regarding transferability of dairy quotas.

Mr. Jopling: I recently issued a discussion paper, copies of which are available in the Library of the House, which explains the possibilities that exist at present for transferring quotas and sets out options for changes to the rules. I am currently considering the views of the industry on this paper.

Environmental Projects and Integrated Farming

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he is making in the negotiations with the European Economic Community to obtain funds within the agricultural budget for environmental projects and integrated farming; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have made it perfectly clear to the Commission and other member states that any decisions on the structures proposals must include satisfactory provisions for conservation, and I shall continue to press the matter.

Beef

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will maintain the beef premium scheme at least at its current levels.

Mr. MacGregor: We shall be pressing to secure continuation of the scheme.

Salmon

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be able to announce his conclusions on the proposal to introduce a salmon tagging scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: We have been carrying out a very thorough review of the practical problems associated with a salmon tagging scheme and are still considering the results. There remain a number of considerable difficulties. I shall make an announcement just as soon as we have been able to reach a conclusion on them.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report the recorded catch of salmon for the north-east drift net fishery for the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: The total catches of salmon recorded in the Northumbrian and Yorkshire water authority areas by both drift nets and inshore nets were:

	Catches
1974	52,747
1975	53,239
1976	15,703
1977	52,886
1978	51,640
1979	43,464
1980	45,790
1981	69,124
1982	50,167
1983	77,277

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what scientific evidence has been commissioned by his Department or has been received by his Department on the effect of drift net fishing on the salmon stocks returning to Scottish rivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: In 1982 my Directorate of Fisheries Research published its Fisheries Research Technical Report No. 67, which was titled "Effects of the English north-east coast salmon fisheries on salmon catches". A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Last year officials were asked to carry out a further examination of the effects of the fishery. As I explained in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) on 20 November 1984, their report was an internal one, based, in part, on information provided in confidence and it will not be published. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office and I are reviewing the management arrangements. We hope to be in a position to announce our conclusions before long.

Nutrition Labelling

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food with which health consumer organisations he is consulting in regard to nutritional labelling.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Exports

67. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the volume of United Kingdom exports in 1984.

Mr. Channon: Between 1983 and 1984, total export volume increased by about 8 per cent.

Manufactures (Export Prices)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in United Kingdom export prices for finished manufactures between (a) 1970 and 1979, (b) 1979 and 1984 and (c) 1962 and 1970, and the comparable German prices to the latest available date in 1984, distinguishing exports to European Economic Community countries and exports to all countries, with all prices converted to pounds sterling at the appropriate rate of exchange.

Mr. Channon: United Kingdom export price data are not compiled on a world area breakdown basis. For Germany, only average value indices are published on this basis. The changes based on the available average value data are in the table.

Arms Exports

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial assistance is given through the Export Credits Guarantee Department or other official bodies to the export of arms or related exports.

Mr. Channon: The general range of ECGD facilities is available for arms and related exports, provided underwriting criteria are satisfied, and that an export licence, where required, has been issued.

Corporate Debt

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to permit holders of zero coupon corporate debt obligations to claim for the full repayment of accrued interest in the event of bankruptcy of the issuer.

Mr. Fletcher: Clause 144(2) of the Insolvency Bill provides that a creditor who has contracted for interest to be paid on his debt can prove for such interest in full in respect of any period up to the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy. By virtue of the provisions of paragraph 11 of schedule 3 to that Bill this provision will also apply in the case of a corporate insolvency.

Departmental Services

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 579, if he will indicate the profit and loss or income and expenditure account and the balance sheet of the services and groups of services listed in his previous answer.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Soviet Union

Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government's policy over maintaining freedom of trade between the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the adoption by the United Kingdom of clause 9 of the United Nations' Food and Agriculture Organisation's proposed international code on the use and distribution of pesticides.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 20 February 1985, c. 654]: The Government welcome the intention of FAO that article 9 of the proposed code of conduct on the distribution and use of pesticides should conform to the United Nations environment programme's provisional notification scheme for banned and severely restricted chemicals. Arrangements are being made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to provide for the notifications of control actions and of first exports which the scheme requires.

CIVIL SERVICE

Select Committees

68. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether the advice given to officials appearing before Select Committees has been revised since 1978.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. A revised "Memorandum of Guidance for Officials Appearing Before Select Committees" was issued by the then Civil Service Department in May 1980. A copy was placed in the Library at the time.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Port Powers (Report)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the report from the Inspectorate of Constabulary concerning the application of port powers, which was requested following the Jellicoe review on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism Act.

Mr. Brittan: The report by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary considers in detail the security arrangements at our ports and it is therefore not possible to make it available as the hon. Member suggests. But I intend to make known my conclusions on the report in due course.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those arrested on miners' picket lines since the beginning of the mining dispute gave their occupations as that of student.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Eighty-five of those arrested in connection with the mining dispute between 13 March 1984 and 12 February 1985 gave their occupation as that of student. These figures do not distinguish between those arrested on the picket line and those arrested elsewhere.

Private Functions (Policing Costs)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to charge the costs of policing private functions, such as party conferences, to the organisers thereof; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no proposals for changing the present arrangements, under which charges are made only for those police services which would not normally be provided in pursuance of the general duty of the police to preserve law and order.

Metropolitan Police Services (Payroll Facilities)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the current arrangements for maintaining computerised payroll facilities for police services in the Metropolitan police area; and what arrangements he proposes to make for the continuation of such facilities following the abolition of the metropolitan counties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The provision of payroll services to metropolitan county police forces is the responsibility of the police authorities for those forces and it will, therefore, be for the new joint boards, which would be created by the Local Government Bill, to secure the provision of these services after the abolition of the metropolitan county councils. We propose to use the powers which clause 80 of the Bill would provide for the first three years after abolition so as to ensure that these and other support services are provided effectively and economically.

Leeds City Council (Staff)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report those posts within the Leeds city council for which he currently authorises payments under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. Waddington: Leeds city council currently has approval for grant to be paid on the following posts:

102 teaching staff (82*)
33 education ancillary staff (29*)
2 educational psychologists*
1 adviser (education)*
1 education welfare officer*
5 nursery officers*
8 primary ESL† nursery nurses*
22 nursery nurses in nurseries*
2 nursery nurses in primary schools*
8 workers in ESL† unit*

1 employment development worker*
1 equal opportunities training officer
1 training and development officer

2 youth club workers*
1 ethnic minority liaison officer and secretary

(* indicates posts subject to the current administrative review of posts approved under the pre November 1982 guidelines)
ESL† = English as a second language.

Departmental Services

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 573, he will state the cost or net revenue accruing to his Department in each of the past three financial years for each of the services listed.

Mr. Brittan: Where the costs are borne directly on my Department's Votes and the income accrues to them, the details requested for each of the services listed in my reply to a question from my hon. Friend on 6 February at columns 572-73 are as follows:

* No expenditure incurred by, or receipts accruing to, the Home Office in respect of these services.

† This service was included under (b) of my reply of 6 February because, in 1983-84, in line with policy, full cost recovery was achieved for successful applicants, the cost of processing unsuccessful applications being subsidised. The figures given for this service are, consistently with the other figures in the table, on a cash basis. The calculation of the nationality fees is now on an accruals accounting basis (see annex B of the Government's reply to the third report from the Home Affairs Committee, Session 1982-83, HC 248: "British Nationality Fees" (March 1984, Cmnd. 9183)).

‡ Available figures include estimates of costs incurred by, and income from fees to, magistrates' courts.

‖ The issue of passports was a Foreign and Commonwealth Office responsibility until 1 April 1984 and the costs were borne on and income accrued to that Department's Votes. I regret that the issue of passports was placed erroneously under (b) of my reply of 6 February, when it should have been placed under (a).

Interception Warrants

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons, holding office under the Crown, are expressly authorised by the Secretary of State to issue warrants in emergencies in his stead.

Mr. Brittan: I assume that the hon. Member has in mind the procedure proposed in clause 4(1)(b) of the Interception of Communications Bill for the issue of interception warrants in urgent cases. This procedure is intended to replace the existing arrangements (as described, for example, in paragraph 9 of the White Paper "The Interception of Communications in Great Britain" —April 1980, Cmnd. 7873) under which the Secretary of State may give oral authority for interception. Under the new procedure, the official to whome the Secretary of State conveys his oral authority will sign a temporary warrant valid for a maximum of two working days, after which it must be renewed personally by the Secretary of State over his own signature if it is to remain valid. As under the present arrangements, only the Secretary of State personally will be empowered to authorise interception, and the official chosen to sign a warrant under clause 4(1) (b) will have to be expressly designated and instructed by the Secretary of State to sign a specific warrant. It is not possible to say in advance how many officials, over a given period of time, might be called on to sign warrants.

Seat Belts

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drivers have been prosecuted within the Metropolitan police area for failing to wear a seat belt in the last 12 months.

Mr. Mellor: In 1983 there were 84 prosecutions in the Metropolitan police district for driving or riding in a motor vehicle while not wearing a seat belt. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Civil Defence

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those local authorities in Wales which have established local authority emergency centres.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The list is as follows.

County Councils
- Clwyd
- Dyfed
- Gwent
- Gwynedd
- Powys
- South Glamorgan
- West Glamorgan

District Councils
- Aberconwy
- Arfon
- Brecknock
- Cardiff
- Colwyn
- Dwfor
- Glyndwr
- Ynys Mon—Isle of Anglesey
- Meirionydd
- Montgomery
- Radnor
- Wrexham Maelor

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those local authorities in Wales which have indicated that they will take part in the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation exercise programme for 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Clwyd county council is expected to take part in the forthcoming Intex 85, which is an international warning and monitoring exercise. No other information is available.

Society for the Protection of Unborn Children (Incident)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about the incident at the offices of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children on Friday 15 February; how many people were involved; how many people have since been arrested; on what charges they were arrested; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that at 12.20 pm on Friday 15 February 12 people entered the premises of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children and wrote slogans and sprayed foam in the offices; a tape recorder was also damaged. At 1.54 pm that afternoon nine people in the vicinity who were thought to answer the description of those seen leaving the premises were arrested for burglary. They were detained for questioning and were released from custody later than afternoon. No charges have yet been brought in respect of the incident, but police inquiries are continuing.

Parole

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the effect of his new policy for restricting parole in the first six months of its operation.

Mr. Brittan: My announcement of 30 November 1983 made it clear that from that date I intended that prisoners sentenced to more than five years for offences of violence or drug trafficking would not be released on parole licence before the last few months of their sentence unless there were exceptional circumstances.

Comparative figures have been specially obtained for the outcome of parole reviews of cases within the scope of the new policy considered in the periods January to June 1983 and 1984. These show that, in the first six months of 1984, only 13 prisoners within the scope of the new policy were granted release eight months or more before the end of their sentence. This compares with 113 of corresponding cases considered in the first six months of 1983.

EMPLOYMENT

Young People (Training)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the number of young people in all training schemes by year since 1977.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of young people entering Manpower Services Commission training schemes in each financial year since 1977 is given in the following table:

Entrants to training schemes for young people

	1977-78	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85*

* Latest estimates.

† The youth training scheme commenced in April 1983 and covers 16 and 17-year-old school leavers and some older disabled leavers.

* The training for skills programme provides support for both apprentices and adults. The figures relate to 16 to 19-year-olds and cover first year apprentices (up to 1982-83), redundant apprentices and unplaced award holders.

The threshold scheme provides computer training for 17 and 18-year-olds.

† The unified vocational preparation programme has been superseded by the youth training scheme.

Community Programme

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people on the community programme are currently undertaking training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of December about 1,000 people on the community programme were receiving specific off-the-job training under the adult training arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 30 July 1984, at columns 121-22. The Government plan to make available off-the-job training for 50,000 community programme participants. The community programme continues to provide a significant contribution in helping long-term unemployed people into permanent jobs and the addition of this training element should further improve the effectiveness of the programme.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many women currently occupying places on the community programme will become ineligible under the new criteria.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The new criteria do not affect people, irrespective of sex or marital status, who have already entered the community programme while they are employed on the programme. Once they have left the programme, everybody has first to satisfy the unemployment eligibility criteria before they can requalify for a place. In addition, they will now normally need to satisfy the benefit eligibility criteria for priority entry to the programme if they wish to take up a further job opportunity under the programme.

Our latest information shows that over 85 per cent. of entrants to the community programme over the last 12 months were benefit recipients just prior to entry. To this should be added those where the head of the household receives benefit payments which enable the partner if unemployed to claim priority and the posts where waivers may have been given for manager, supervisor and key worker jobs where it does not prove possible to recruit benefit recipients. It is therefore not possible to give precise estimates by sex of the numbers who will be unable to claim priority status.

National Freight Corporation

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Employment what score was given by the Health and Safety Executive at its last basic inspection of the premises of the National Freight Corporation, Brightside Lane, Sheffield, under the headings: potential risk to the public and potential risk to employees on the Health and Safety Executive's hazard rating form.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member about the inspection of the National Freight Warehouse and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Wages and Jobs (Research)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what research his Department has carried out or studied into the relationship between the abolition of the wages councils and the creation of jobs;

(2) what research his Department has carried out or studied into the relationship between a reduction in youth wages and the creation of new jobs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is extensive relevant literature. Of the studies which deal specifically with the possible effects of wages councils on jobs and with the link between youth pay and employment, the Department is currently considering the following in particular.

H. Neuburger. From the Dole Queue to the Sweatshop. Low Pay Pamphlet No. 30: Low Pay Unit 1984.

D. Forrest and S. R. Dennison. Low Pay or No Pay. Hobart Paper No. 101: Institute of Economic Affairs 1984.

C. Craig and F. Wilkinson. Pay and Employment in Four Retail Trades. DE Research Paper (forthcoming).

P. Makeham. Youth Unemployment. DE Research Paper No. 10: 1980.

Ashton, Maguire and Garland. Youth in the Labour Market. DE Research Paper No. 34: March 1982.

W. Wells. Relative Pay and Employment of Young People. DE Research Paper No. 42: December 1983.

OECD. Employment Outlook: Chapter 5. A survey of international evidence: September 1984.

Continuing Departmental evaluation of the young workers' scheme.

Motor Vehicle Industry

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment why the reduction in real earnings in the motor vehicle industry relative to the economy generally in recent years has not led to an increase in employment in that industry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cost of labour is an important determinant of employment, but it is not the only one. Other elements such as productivity, international competition and the design and reliability of the final product also play a part.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state, from the date of its inception and on an annual basis, the percentage of those who complete a youth training scheme course who go on to further education.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This information is not yet available. A regular follow-up programme of young people leaving the youth training scheme is now under way. Questionnaires are being sent to a 15 per cent. sample of leavers in each month a few months after they leave. Results from this programme will include the percentage of young people in full-time education or training at the time of the survey. Most of the trainees who completed their programme under the first year of the scheme left in August and September 1984 and information relating to these trainees should be available from late May.

Departmental Services

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to his reply of 8 February, Official Report, column 705, he will specify (i) the cost to his Department of the major services listed for which no fees are charged or for which fees are charged which do not cover the cost, and (ii) the precise revenue and expenditure figures including all allocation of overheads for the past three fiscal years relating to services for which fees are set exactly to cover the costs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

(i) List of services for which no fees are charged or for which fees are charged which do not cover the cost.

Power Stations (Demolition)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Employment what responsibility he has for ensuring the safe demolition of disused power stations, including the removal of asbestos.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Responsibility for ensuring the safe demolition of disused power stations, including the removal of asbestos, lies with those undertaking the work. Such work is subject to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and associated legislation. The Health and Safety Executive is the enforcing authority at these sites.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the tonnages of pesticide active ingredients used in (a) timber treatment, and (b) other non-agricultural uses, made up by (i) pentachlorophenol, (ii) dieldrin, (iii) lindane and (iv) TBTO in the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available.

WALES

Civil Defence

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what contribution his Department will be making to the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation exercise Wintex 85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department will not be making any contribution to the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation in connection with the exercise Wintex-Cimex 85.

Hospital Statistics

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of National Health Service amenity beds, deaths and discharges of patients and average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for the last five years.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of private hospitals which offer acute surgical care and the number of beds and occupancy rate for all facilities offering such care, by region, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The available information is given in the following table. Details of occupancy rates are not held centrally.

Notes:

* As per Water authorities (Return on Assets) Orders 1984 and 1985.

† Temporary reductions from 0·71 (Thames) and 0·91 (Wessex) were agreed to deal with negative balances following 1983-84 accounting adjustments and other factors.

‡ The Return on Assets Orders require the return to be expressed as a percentage of the mean of the beginning and end-year net assets. The figures given in this table incorporate estimates of the movements of the relevant repricing indices and of additions to assets less depreciation. Precise figures will only be available when the accounts for these years are published in July 1985 and July 1986 respectively.

‖ It should be noted that these figures include the effect of inflation and new investment less depreciation on the value of net assets as well as the effect of the change in target rate of return. Also the effect of the target rates of return will be modified to the extent that authorities add to or draw down balances during each year.

¶ In both years, Northumbrian WA needs to over-achieve the target rate of return to break even.

• Change relative to 1984-85 targets given in note 2 above.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing, for each water authority in England, the cost effect for each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 of (a) the change in external financing limit compared to 1984-85, (b) the change in approved capital expenditure compared to 1984-85, (c) the extra income compared to 1984-85 corresponding to the change in target return on capital and (d) cash to be generated from cost savings or other sources, compared to 1984-85.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information requested, in so far as it is available, is as follows:

(a) External Finance Limits (including provision for MAFF grants)

Water authority	1984-85 £ millions	1985-86 £ millions
North West	87·0	79·5
Northumbrian	26·0	23·0
Severn-Trent	40·0	22·0
Yorkshire	34·0	31·0
Anglian	60·0	46·0
Thames	(34·0)	(60·0)
Southern	23·0	11·0
Wessex	16·0	21·0
South West	11·0	9·5
	263·0	183·0

Note: Later years' figures for individual authorities are provisional and subject to uncertainties arising from possible fluctuations in trading conditions and from the fact that external finance is the residual between large off-setting flows of revenues and costs. Publication of such figures could therefore be misleading.

(b) Planned Investment (excluding land drainage)

Water authority	1984-85 £ millions	1985-86 £ millions
North West	140·0	156·0
Northumbrian	35·0	38·0
Severn-Trent	111·0	119·0

Anglian	94·0	97·0
Thames	100·0	109·0
Southern	56·0	61·0
Wessex	35·0	49·0
South West	33·0	38·0
	686·0	762·0

Note: The above figures show the investment which was planned at the time the EFLs were set. For later years the total investment provisionally planned for the nine authorities is £824 million for 1986-87 and £868 million for 1987-88.

(c) Income due to change in target return on capital

The hon. Member is referred to the answer given to his previous question.

(d) Cost Savings: Targets for reductions in real operating costs (called "Performance Aims") have been agreed with each authority as follows:

Water authority	Reduction in real operating costs compared with 1982-83 to be achieved by 1986-87 £ million, (1982-83 prices)
North West	−1·1
Northumbrian	−1·6

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Welwyn Hatfield district council regarding the future funding allocation for the homes insulation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Welwyn Hatfield district council have asked for its initial allocation of £21,000 for homes insulation scheme grants in 1985-86 to be increased in the light of the demand for grants in their area, and have been allocated an additional £14,000 from the reserve of £7 million for the scheme in England held back for the coming year.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the allocation for 1985-86 in respect of homes insulation grant for each of the local authorities in Leicestershire.

Sir George Young: The following initial allocations for homes insulation scheme grants in 1985-86 have been made to authorities in Leicestershire:

	£000
Blaby	35
Charnwood	50
Harborough	40
Hinckley and Bosworth	65
Leicester	175
Melton	20
North West Leicestershire	35
Oadby and Wigston	30
Rutland	15

We have also established a £7 million reserve out of which additional allocations can be made to authorities in England as required by demand during the year.

Prefabricated Concrete Houses

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be able to announce the details of the arrangements made between the Building Societies Association and the National House Building Council for the assessment of methods of repair and for insurance of repair to prefabricated concrete houses.

Mr. Gow: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him of 30 January, at column 179-80. Good progress is being made. I will make a further announcement as soon as the arrangements are finalised.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice or assistance he intends to give to owners of prefabricated concrete houses built after 1960 and not covered by the Housing Defects Act but which the building societies are reluctant to handle.

Mr. Gow: The Building Research Establishment's findings on prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings relate only to types designed before 1960. My Department is not aware of any reports that any type of prefabricated concrete house of more recent design is inherently defective and there is therefore no basis on which my right hon. Friend could consider designating such types of dwelling under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

I am aware that some owners of prefabricated concrete houses built after 1960 have encountered difficulties relating to the mortgageability of their homes. Mortgage lending is a matter for the lending institutions concerned. In view of the difficulties which I have mentioned, my Department hopes to have further discussions with the Building Societies Association on the condition of dwellings of non-traditional design generally.

House Building

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing starts have been carried out by local authorities in the years 1975 to 1980 on an annual basis, and between 1980 and the most recently available date; and if he will give similar figures for the private sector.

Sir George Young: Figures of housing starts in England in the years 1975 to 1983 appear in table 6.1 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-1983". Provisional public and private sector estimates for 1984 were published in table 2 of the Department's press notice No. 48 on 5 February 1985, and for sub-divisions of the public sector in table 3. Copies of both publications are available in the Library.

Bottled Water

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the number of occasions on which bottled water was issued by water authorities for children because of high nitrate levels in public water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am aware of only one case in the last five years. At Kirby Hill and Baldersby, near Boroughbridge, in North Yorkshire, the Yorkshire water authority regularly supply at any one time about 20 nursing mothers with bottled water. However, the two borehole sources in question will soon be phased out.

Urban Programme (Holiday Projects)

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum allocated for holiday projects under the urban programme in 1984-85; and if he will make it his policy to maintain this allocation in 1985-86.

Sir George Young: Urban programme support for holiday projects in 1984-85 amounted to approximately £2·5 million. In 1985-86 urban programme resources will be concentrated in the most deprived urban areas, with partnership and programme authorities receiving the same initial allocations in cash terms as for the present year. Programmes for these areas are drawn up in accordance with local needs and ministerial priorities, and no national total is set for particular classes of project. Total resources allocated to the traditional urban programme will fall by about 10 per cent. and there is a high level of ongoing commitments, but resources for new projects, including holiday projects, will be concentrated on the most needy areas.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received recently regarding the level of funding for holiday projects under the urban programme.

Sir George Young: Letters have been received from two voluntary organisations about the level of support under the traditional urban programme for holiday projects in 1985-86.

Unsound and Defective Unit Homes

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to indemnify local councils like the borough of Southend-on-Sea from any actions stemming from failure to implement their legal obligations on the purchase of unsound and defective homes where the use of the necessary funds is prevented solely by his refusal to permit the use of more than 20 per cent. of the authority's capital receipts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: In setting local authorities' housing investment programme allocations for 1985-86 my right hon. Friend took account of the need for expenditure on defective prefabricated reinforced concrete houses. It is for individual authorities to decide their own spending priorities in the light of their likely statutory obligations, within the total resources available to them.

GLC (Property Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when the Greater London council can expect to receive written consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for the disposal of 30A Lee High road;

(2) when the Greater London council can expect to receive written consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for the disposal of 18-26 Lee High road;

(3) when the Greater London council can expect to receive written consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for the disposal of 1A Longley road, Tooting;

(4) when the Greater London council can expect to receive written consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for the disposal of 2 Home road, Battersea;

(5) why the Greater London council's application under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 to dispose of 95 Battersea Rise took nearly six months to process.

Sir George Young: No application for consent under section 8 has been received in respect of 30A Lee High road or 1A Longley road, Tooting.

Applications in respect of 230A Lee High road and 14 Longley road, Tooting and also 18 to 26 Lee High road, 2 Home road, Battersea and 95 Battersea Rise were received on 15 August 1984. Section 8 consent was given for these by telephone and in writing on 23 August 1984. Following inquiries by the GLC, written consent was reaffirmed in early September and again in respect of 95 Battersea Rise in January 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under section 8 of the London Goverment (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 submitted by the Greater London council before 1 September 1984 are still awaiting written consent.

Sir George Young: One. This application was received on 9 August. The GLC was asked on 10 October to provide certain additional information necessary to enable my right hon. Friend to reach a decision. To date no response has been received from the GLC.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from prospective purchasers of properties requiring consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Sir George Young: Numerous representations have been received. In the majority of cases consent had already been given. In others, no application for consent had been received from the local authority concerned.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act are still being considered by his Department.

Sir George Young: 117.

Docklands

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the London Dockland Development Corporation has budgeted for the royal docks area compulsory purchase under the following heading (a) total budget for the London Docklands (East Docklands) Compulsory Purchase Order, (b) land acquisition, (c) relocation and compensation for businesses and other users of the sites; and (d) preparation of the order, legal costs, costs of public inquiry into the compulsory purchase order and other administrative costs of the order.

Sir George Young: The corporation has budgeted for £100,000 to promote the CPO for East Docklands, but an accurate estimate cannot be made until the conclusion of the objection period when a view can be taken on the likely length and complexity of the proceedings. It is not possible at this stage to provide a reliable estimate of land acquisition, relocation and compensation costs.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the London Docklands Development Corporation's operational plan, part 2 of the corporate plan, will be made available to the public.

Sir George Young: The operational plan has been available to the public since 31 January 1985. Copies were sent by LDDC at that time to local Members of Parliament (including the hon. Gentleman), local authorities, area health authorities and other interested bodies.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of acquisition/infrastructure and reclamation works, and the disposal price, of all London Docklands Development Corporation sites already disposed of.

Sir George Young: The disposal price of sites sold up to 31 March 1984 was £6·18 million, and the acquisition, infrastructure and reclamation costs directly related to these sites was £5·24 million.

There is, however, a contingent liability for compensation for land vested by Parliament in the corporation, which has not yet been finalised and which may add to the above acquisition costs.

The figures also exclude housing sites where a developer has been awarded a licence to build by the LDDC and the disposal of the freehold has not yet taken place.

Inter-Action

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money out of the total contract being considered for Inter-Action is for the transfer of its base at the Royal docks.

Sir George Young: A project application for Inter-Action's work in Docklands, which included a contribution towards relocation and refurbishment costs, was submitted to the Department but has now been withdrawn by the corporation.

Block Grant

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report tables showing for each local authority in England the amount of block grant that each would receive in 1985-86 after close ending and holdback if each authority spent at the level of its 1984-85 budget plus 4½ per cent., and the assumption in Cmnd. 9428 of the increase in the gross domestic product deflator.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have arranged for this information to be placed in the Library.

CIPFA (Exhibition)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for an exhibition by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House to arrange for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 1 April 1985 to Friday 5 April 1985.

Rent Act 1977

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the light of the appeal court decision in the case of Pocock v Steel on 16 November 1984, he intends to introduce amending legislation at the earliest opportunity to safeguard the position of an owner who has let his property temporarily under case II of schedule 15 to the Rent Act 1977.

Mr. Gow: I understand the concern about the implications of this decision for some of those landlords who have let their property under the provisions of case II. I am considering what action might be taken.

Rate Precept Limitation Order

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the level of resources of each of the authorities subject to the rate precept limitation order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on Monday 18 February, at column 333-34.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the cost of extending youth training schemes for two years to all 16 and 17-year-old school leavers who are not already committed to further education courses.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Estimates of the cost of providing additional training opportunities for young people involve making a number of assumptions, principally on the size of the client group, the likely length of stay on the scheme, the rules for funding the scheme and the proportions of time young people spend in training and on work experience. Consideration of the range of basic assumptions yields a number of options for the extent and cost of future youth training provision and it is therefore not possible to provide a single estimate of the cost of extending the youth training scheme.

TRANSPORT

Iraq-Iran War

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many British seamen have been killed or wounded in each of the years of the conflict between Iraq and Iran; whether he will estimate the damage to British shipping for each of the years concerned; and what urgent steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to safeguard British lives in international waters.

Mr. David Mitchell: Prior to 1984 no British seafarers were killed or injured as a result of attacks on shipping in the Gulf. In 1984 two British seafarers were killed and six were injured. Three British divers were also killed in 1984.

Shortly after the beginning of the conflict between Iran and Iraq in the Autumn of 1980 a large number of ships were trapped in the Shatt-al-Arab. Among these were three British ships. It is understood that insurance claims for loss by detention in Iraq have been paid in respect of these vessels but my Department has no details of the amounts involved.

In 1984 two British-registered ships were attacked in the Gulf. The Charming was extensively damaged but the British Renown sustained only slight damage. My Department has no figures to indicate the cost of repairs involved.

Her Majesty's Government deplore the continued attacks on neutral shipping in international waters which put at risk the lives of innocent seafarers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has protested to the responsible Governments on each occasion when British seafarers have been killed or injured and following the attacks on the Charming and British Renown. The Government have also supported resolutions in the Security Council upholding the principle of free navigation in international waters.

The Government have been concerned about the safety of navigation in the Gulf since the beginning of the conflict. I have no powers to direct British ships not to enter this area, but I have periodically issued guidance on the situation to shipowners and seafarers through the General Council of British Shipping and the seafarers' unions, most recently on 15 February in these terms:

> "The Iran/Iraq conflict continues to present a threat to shipping in the Gulf. The Government's advice to British shipping companies remains that they should consider the latest information on the situation in the Gulf before deciding to send vessels into the area. It is for the companies to inform their crews about the risks involved. Masters should exercise all necessary vigilance whilst in the Gulf."

It is British shipowners' normal practice to inform their crews when a voyage will involve a passage within the Gulf and to afford seamen an opportunity to leave a ship if they wish before it enters the war zone designated under the National Maritime Board agreement between the General Council of British Shipping and the seafarers' unions. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has made arrangements for seamen to obtain advice from diplomatic posts in the areas of potential danger. British seamen can of course call on the services of consular officials in the usual way.

Bus Deregulation

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has that deregulation will increase the market for bus travel.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is widely acknowledged that deregulation will bring down prices and improve services on many routes particularly in urban areas; and that price reductions and improved frequency increase patronage. The scope for this has recently been demonstrated in Exeter, where changes in the quality of commercial services have brought a 100 per cent. increase in patronage. Deregulation of express services in 1980 produced a 45 per cent. increase in passenger carryings on NBC services alone, alongside an increase in the market share of independent operators from almost nothing to 30 per cent. In the only urban trial area, Hereford, no patronage figures are available but the 78 per cent. increase in bus kilometres between 1981 and 1984 indicates higher demand.

Gritting

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance is given by his Department on the gritting of (a) roads and (b) pavements for which he is responsible; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Detailed guidance on the winter maintenance of the Department's roads—motorways and all-purpose trunk roads—is given in the Department's booklet "Winter Maintenance of Motorways and Trunk Roads: Statement of Service and Code of Practice", prepared in consultation with the local authority associations and last published in August 1984. The guidance refers to the treatment of the carriageways. No special guidance on the techniques of treating pavements has been considered necessary for all-purpose trunk roads.

A12 Chelmsford Bypass

Mr. St. John-Stevas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will install crash barriers to protect against crossover crashes on the new A12 Chelmsford bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer I gave to him on 28 November 1984, at columns 478-79. Our review of the case for crash barriers on the bypass is nearing completion and I hope to make an announcement in the near future.

Mr. St. John-Stevas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will install lighting on the new A12 Chelmsford bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: Lighting will be provided at the five interchanges on the new A12 Chelmsford bypass and I am investigating whether further lighting is justified.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the repairs and maintenance work on the Severn bridge will be completed; what is the total cost to date; and what is the current total estimated cost when the work is concluded.

Mrs. Chalker: Since the bridge was opened £10·3 million has been spent on maintenance and repair. As my hon. Friend told the House on 7 February 1984, at columns 763-64, the programme for strengthening is expected to take five to six years and to cost about £33 million.

Cycling

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will organise a conference on cycling in 1985.

Mrs. Chalker: I intend to hold a conference on cycling safety in April. Lord Nugent of Guildford has agreed to act as chairman and I will be issuing invitations to a representative audience shortly. I intend the conference to be a forum for discussion of a wide range of measures to help increase the safety of cyclists. I hope that these discussions will aid the Department, local authorities and others when developing their policies for cycling.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Community Budget

98. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the European Economic Community budget for 1985 is to be allocated to the social fund; and what proportion to agriculture.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The draft 1985 Community budget was rejected by the European Parliament on 13 December. The Council of Ministers has not yet considered a revised draft 1985 budget.

100. Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the European Economic Community Council will consult the European Assembly about the 1985 European Economic Community budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The draft 1985 budget was rejected by the European Parliament on 13 December. When a new draft budget has been established by the Council it will be forwarded to the Parliament, in accordance with article 203 of the Treaty of Rome.

European Unit of Account

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the European Commission President's call for a strengthening of the role of the European unit of account.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission President's statement to the European Parliament on 14 January 1985 covered among other subjects, the European currency unit, which has since 1979 taken the place of the European unit of account. We support the principle of further development of the ECU. Specific proposals were discussed at the Finance Council meeting on 10 December 1984 and it was agreed by all Members that these required further careful study to ensure that the best possible options were adopted.

Wage and Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1954 the percentage increase in real wages before and after tax for (a) manual workers and (b) the labour force generally, together with the nearest equivalent figures, in each case, showing the increase in employment and unemployment, respectively.

Mr. Peter Rees: Pre-tax nominal wages for manual workers can be found in "British Labour Statistics" (Historical Abstract 1886-1968, and annual issues until 1976) and, for more recent data, in the Employment Gazette, table 5.4. Some figures for the whole economy are shown on page 110 of Economic Trends, Annual Supplement 1985. Wages and salaries, for all employees but not for manual workers, on a post-tax basis can be calculated using data for taxes and household income shown in the Blue Book, tables 9.6 and 4.4 respectively. Real wages can be derived using the retail prices index. Figures for total employment and unemployment are shown on page 99 of Economic Trends, Annual Supplement 1985. Figures for the numbers of employed and unemployed manual workers are not readily available, though up to 1982 unemployment figures were available disaggregated by previous occupation and were published in the Employment Gazette and "British Labour Statistics" Historical Abstract.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual increase in real wages and in employment assumed in the base run of his simulation of the effect on employment of a reduction in real wages; and if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each year the figures in the base run for employment, wages, prices, interest rates, the money supply, the public sector borrowing requirement, purchases of gilt-edged, exhange rates and imports and exports of manufactures.

Mr. Peter Rees: The figures in the base run used in the simulations were derived from a recent Treasury forecast. It is not my practice to publish forecasts in the detail requested. The results of the simulations are not in any case very sensitive to the base run values used.

£5 Note

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what official studies and researches are in train to decide a coin alternative to the £5 note.

Mr. Ian Stewart: None.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to replace the £5 note by a coin.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No, Sir.

VAT (Registration)

Mr. Baldry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average length of time that it takes a business that has applied voluntarily to be registered for value added tax to be so registered.

Mr. Hayhoe: About three weeks.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the increase in gross domestic product over the past 12 months.

Mr. Peter Rees: The preliminary output based estimate for gross domestic product in the fourth quarter of 1984 was 2 per cent. higher than at the same time a year earlier. GDP in 1984 as a whole however was 2½ per cent. higher than in 1983.

Committee on Enforcement Powers of the Revenue Departments

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the response to his invitation to interested parties to comment on the proposals made in volume 3 of the report of the Committee on Enforcement Powers of the Revenue Departments, Cmnd. 9120, concerning development land tax, petroleum revenue tax, capital transfer tax and stamp duty.

Mr. Lawson: Responses were received from 12 bodies representing the interests of industry, commerce and the professions. Those responses show a wide measure of agreement with the committee's aim of securing the harmonisation of the rules of compliance and enforcement across all of the direct taxes in line with the proposals made in volumes 1 and 2 of the report.

The representatives expressed some reservations on individual recommendations and I have authorised the Inland Revenue to arrange discussions on them with the interested parties in the near future. I hope that it will be possible, in the light of those discussions, for the Government to reach its final conclusions in time for legislation in 1986.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will estimate the proportion of capital spending by central and local government undertaken in the northern region.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing revenues obtained from each rate of income tax in each year since 1978-79 at current and constant 1978-79 prices; and if he will also show the percentage increase in revenue from the lowest rate of income tax showing 1978-79 as 100.

Mr. Moore I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect the fall in the exchange rate since the end of 1981 has had on inflation.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Minimum Lending Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect the increase in minimum lending rate in 1985 will have on inflation.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mentally Ill Persons (Community Provision)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present level of community provision for the mentally ill.

Mr. John Patten: We are concerned to raise the level of community provision for the mentally ill, so that those mentally ill people now living in the community can receive a full range of support services, and so that people who are now in hospital but would be more suitably cared for in the community can be discharged to the right provision. Current ministerial initiatives, such as the development of co-ordinated systems of aftercare for schizophrenia under the "Helping the Community to Care" programme, and the funding of five mental illness pilot schemes under the "Care in the Community" programme, are designed to help both these groups. We are encouraged by the growth in the community services which is recorded in the Department's annual report 1984.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, for the most recent 12-month period and for each year since 1979, what was the total number of bed-nights provided in each of his Department's 23 resettlement units.

Mr. Whitney: The total number of bed-nights provided in each of the Department's resettlement units since 1980 are in the table. No figures are available for 1979.

Unit	1984	1983	1982	1981	1980

Hospitals (Costs)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of a modern general hospital.

Mr. John Patten: The average total cost of a 300-bed first phase nucleus hospital is £16·5 million. The first 12 nucleus hospitals completed have shown an average saving on the capital costs of a conventional design of £1·27 million or 10·8 per cent. In other words, the lower costs of these 12 nucleus hospitals enabled one more hospital to be built than would have been possible for the same total expenditure using conventional designs.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what provisions he proposes to ensure that patients living in remote areas far removed from chemists' shops will continue to have ready access to preparations not included in the Government's limited list that are prescribed and dispensed at present by the local general practitioner on National Health Service prescriptions;

(2) what proposals he has to meet the situation of dispensing doctors who decide that, for clinical reasons, patients should be prescribed analgesics or laxatives not included on National Health Service prescription after the introduction of his limited drug list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We shall be announcing our proposals shortly.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total National Health Service expenditure per head of population in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is estimated that total expenditure on the National Health Service, excluding patients charges, in 1984-85 will be about £286 per head of population in England. The estimate is derived from the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428-II).

NHS (Director of Personnel)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the director of personnel recommended by the Griffiths inquiry is to be appointed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We hope to make an announcement soon about the setting up of the NHS management board.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has plans to issue a directive to regional health authorities requiring them to draw up plans for prevention and treatment of alcohol abuse similar to that issued in relation to the misuse of drugs.

Mr. John Patten: Services for the prevention and treatment of alcohol abuse are already better developed than those for the misuse of drugs. Consideration is being given to the need for further guidance to health authorities.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the total sum of money paid, in the form of unemployment benefit, to male, female and young claimants in the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and if he will break down this figure in table form to show the amounts paid in each of the English regions;

(2) what was the total sum of money paid, in the form of unemployment benefit, to male, female and young claimants in the last 12 months to the latest convenient date in Wales;

(3) what was the total sum of money paid, in the form of unemployment benefit, to male, female and young claimants in the last 12 months to the latest convenient date in Scotland.

Mr. Whitney: The total expenditure on unemployment benefit in Great Britain in the financial year 1983-84 was £1,497 million. A breakdown of this figure is available as follows:

England	£1,244 million
Scotland	£172 million
Wales	£81 million

These figures are based on a computer analysis of girocheque encashments. A further analysis to show the amounts paid in each of the English regions could be provided, but only at disproportionate cost, and I regret that the information requested regarding expenditure by sex and age is not available.

AIDS

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special measures are planned to safeguard haemophiliacs from acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are acting to protect haemophiliacs from the risk of AIDs being contracted from their use of blood products. For details of the action being taken, I refer the hon. Member to my replies of 4 February and 5 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) at columns 450-51 and 525-27.

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the action being taken to prevent and control the spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are taking all practical steps to prevent and control the spread of AIDS, in the present state of knowledge about the disease.

We have set up an expert advisory group. The membership of the group includes experts on all aspects of the disease, from throughout the United Kingdom, and is as follows

The group has already met, and a series of meetings of the group itself and of its working groups has been arranged to take place in the next few weeks. The first priority is to advise on all measures necessary to control the spread of the disease.

We have been considering the desirability of making AIDS a notifiable disease. Having consulted the expert advisory group and sought the views of doctors specialising in the field, we are satisfied that the present reporting system to the communicable disease surveillance centre is operating effectively and we do not need any new powers at the moment to enable a count to be made of cases and to monitor the spread of the disease. Experience with other sexually transmitted diseases suggests that notification would not assist in control of the disease. We will, however, keep the position under constant review.

There might be very rare and exceptional cases where the nature of a patient's condition would place him in a dangerously infectious state which would make it desirable to admit him or to detain him in hospital. There has not so far been any such case, nor are we aware of any present risk of one. We are satisfied that we need to take powers now to be in a position to protect the public in the event of such a risk arising. It is my intention, therefore, to lay regulations under the Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984 which would give reserve powers to authorities to detain a patient when he is in a dangerously infectious condition.

I must stress that these powers have no relevance to the overwhelming majority of AIDS patients. We have no intention of dealing with AIDS patients generally under greater restraints than other patients. We need these reserve powers for the very rare case that might eventually arise somewhere some time.

We have been following a policy of taking every practicable step to protect all sections of the public against the spread of this infectious disease. The policy has five main features.

First, and at the centre of our strategy, lie a number of public health measures aimed at health professionals and "at risk" groups. At the request of the Health Departments and the Health and Safety Executive, the Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens (ACDP) has drawn up interim guidelines to safeguard the health of medical and nursing staff and others who may come in contact with AIDS patients and specimens taken from them. These guidelines, which were distributed on 16 January to all health authorities concerned will be reviewed by the ACDP within the next 12 months in the light of scientific developments in this field. The Chief Medical Officer will shortly be writing to all doctors giving guidance on the clinical factors and public health implication of the disease.

Secondly, leaflets have been produced by the Health Education Council to promote greater awareness of the risks of the disease. These are now being made available in large numbers to individuals in at risk groups such as male homosexuals and intravenous drug abusers, and to the public generally. So far as the voluntary sector is concerned, my officials have met the Terrence Higgins Trust to discuss the need for Government funding to assist them in the provision of information and counselling services to those affected by the disease.

Thirdly, measures are being taken to safeguard recipients of blood and blood products. We have strengthened our efforts to dissuade persons in the AIDS high-risk groups from donating blood. The latest edition of our leaflets "AIDS — Important New Advice for Blood Donors" has been sent to all regional transfusion centres and is being distributed individually to all donors.

Fourthly, tests to screen blood donations for HTLV III antibody are being developed and we are co-ordinating the evaluation work needed to ensure that such a test can be introduced routinely in the national blood transfusion service as soon as possible. We have written today to regional health authorities asking them to set aside funds in 1985-86 for the introduction of this screening test in their blood transfusion centres.

Finally, imported heat-treated Factor VIII for haemophiliacs is already available for prescription by clinicians on a "named patient" basis, and we are considering urgently a number of abridged applications for product licences. It is hoped that by April this year all the Factor VIII made by the blood products laboratory, Elstree, will be heat-treated. Limited supplies are available at present for clinical trials. We are taking steps to ensure that the United Kingdom is self-sufficient in all blood products as soon as possible. In particular, we have been investing £35 million in new developments at Elstree which should begin to come into production during 1986.

AIDS has attracted much publicity and public concern. It is highly regrettable that in some instances confidential details of individuals suffering from the disease have been made public. This release of information does nothing to create a more informed view about the disease and certainly does not help those affected by the disease. We will therefore be reminding health authorities that personal information about patients must not be made public without proper consent.

Shenley Hospital

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total sum to be transferred from Brent district health authority to the Brent borough social services accounts for the year 1985-86 in respect of the care in the community project to transfer 60 patients from Shenley hospital.

Mr. John Patten: Brent district health authority expects to transfer some £335,000 to the London borough of Brent in 1985-86 in connection with the Shenley hospital project. The precise amount will depend on the progress of the project. Until March 1987 the health authority is being reimbursed from centrally reserved funds as part of the "Care in the Community" programme of pilot projects.

Maternity Services Advisory Committee (Report)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish the third report of the Maternity Services Advisory Committee.

Mr. John Patten: The committee's third report—on care of the mother and baby — is to be published tomorrow and copies will be placed in the Library. As the report completes the review of the whole field of maternity care for which it was set up in 1981, we have accepted the chairman's recommendation that the committee should now be wound up. We are grateful to Mrs. Munro and to her committee's members for their commitment of time and effort over the past three years in producing three valuable reports. The agreement reached between the different professions represented and the lay members has been very impressive. We hope the same level of co-operation can be achieved at local level when the committee's advice is considered and put into effect. We shall be monitoring action taken by health authorities on the committee's reports through the accountability review process and will keep under consideration the need to convene ad hoc groups to consider any further particular issues that arise in the field of maternity care.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of extending housing benefit, on its present scale rates, to owner-occupiers.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 24 January 1985, c. 521]: Owner-occupiers can already receive help with rates through the housing benefits scheme. The supplementary benefit scheme takes account of owner-occupiers' mortgage interest charges and the transfer of that help to the housing benefit scheme would not involve additional benefit costs. The estimated annual cost of extending housing benefit to the mortgage interest payments net of tax relief of other owner-occupiers on the same basis as for rent rebates would be about £100 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received a copy of "Families Rent Apart," published by the Child Poverty Action Group and Youthaid on the effect on families with working children living at home of the reductions in the parents' entitlement to housing benefit; if he will meet the authors of the pamphlet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 166]: I regret that my previous answer was incorrect. My right hon. Friend has received a copy of "Families Rent Apart" and the Child Poverty Action Group has recently sent me a further copy. We shall be studying this report with interest.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many discharges from hospital there were following diagnosis of septic abortion in each of the following years: 1967, 1968, 1969, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 457]: The available information is given in the table:

Estimated number of discharges (including deaths) from NHS hospitals in England and Wales with main diagnosis of septic abortion

Year	Estimated number
1967	2,530
1968	3,110
1969	2,080
1975	610
1980	380
1982	450

Prescriptions

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each of the past five years, the total number of prescriptions and their total cost, at 1984 prices, written by general practitioners; and what assumption he has made for planning purposes of the total number and total cost for each of the next three years, at 1984 prices (a) including and (b) excluding any limited list effect.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 8 February 1985, c. 731]: The information requested is as follows:

Year ending 31 March	Number of Prescriptions (millions)	Total Cost £ millions—in 1983-84 Economic cost terms
1981	319·6	1,191·7
1982	317·4	1,252·4
1983	330·0	1,346·5
1984	334·3	1,430·6
*1985	345·0	1,500·0

* Provisional.

The provision for family practitioner services expenditure for 1985-86 to 1987-88 contained in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428) takes account of savings from the limited list effect. Details of the breakdown of the provision for 1985-86 will be shown in the estimates which will be laid before the House shortly. The detailed information requested for 1986-87 and 1987-88 is not available.

NORTHERN IRELAND

School Buses

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will review the regulation which permits 102 children to travel sitting or standing on a 53-seater school bus.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes. The regulations which govern the carrying of children on buses are being reviewed as part of a general review of the Public Service Vehicle Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1965.

Housing Executive

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total level of arrears owed to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive for rent, rates and heating.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the total level of arrears at 31 December 1984 owed by both current and former tenants for rent, rates and district heating charges was £19·890 million.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland Housing Executive tenants owe over £100 for (a) rent arrears and (b) heating arrears.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available in the form requested. However, I am informed that the number of current tenants at 31 December 1984 owing more than four weeks' charges for rent and rates was 41,140 and for district heating was 2,349.

Home Help

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland upon what basis those people who are granted a home help are selected.

Mr. Chris Patten: To ensure that those whose needs are greatest receive the home help service the Department of Health and Social Services has set out in departmental circular HSS(SS)1/80, a copy of which is available in the Library, criteria for assessing need together with a list of groups to whom priority should be given. In the light of these criteria and the finance available it is for boards to decide who should be granted home help.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are receiving weekly (a) more than 10 hours, (b) five to 10 hours, (c) two to five hours, (d) one to two hours and (e) less than one hour of the time of a home help in each of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Oxygen Supplies

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans his Department has for the replacement of cylinder oxygen in National Health Service hospitals in Northern Ireland with concentrators; and what clinical and financial benefits he expects to attach to such replacements.

Mr. Chris Patten: There are no such plans.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current state of the domiciliary oxygen service in Northern Ireland; what changes his Department is making to prescribing practices and supply; and what representations he has received from patients about such charges.

Mr. Chris Patten: Patients needing regular supplies of oxygen obtain it on prescription from pharmacists who deliver oxygen cylinders to their homes. Although this service is satisfactory, consideration is being given to the provision of oxygen concentrators for patients requiring large quantities of oxygen. No representations have been received from patients about possible changes.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total sum of money paid, in the form of unemployment benefit, to male, female and young claimants in the last 12 months to the latest convenient date in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not available. However, the total amount paid in unemployment benefit in the 12 months ending 30 September 1984 was £47·417 million.

Mr. Thomas Power

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement detailing the total period of time for which Thomas Power has been held on remand, the number of court appearances he has made, the various charges he has faced or is facing, the charges he faced which have been dismissed, the dates on which these various charges were made or dismissed and the various dates on which Mr. Power was arrested;

(2) if he will make a statement outlining why Thomas Power has been held on remand over such a long period of time.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Remedial Teachers

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the Department of Education for Northern Ireland has decided to remove the one shared remedial teacher post from Killyman, Moy, Moygashel and Tamnamore controlled primary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The decision to remove the remedial teacher post from these schools in the school year 1985-86 was taken after the staffing needs of the schools had been considered in the normal way taking account of their total enrolments, the number of pupils requiring remedial education and the total staffing allocated to each school.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the planned reduction in primary teaching staff in the controlled sector in the Southern Education and Library Board area for the year 1985-86; and to what extent this will lead to a reduction in remedial teachers.

Mr. Scott: The present allocation of full-time teaching posts to controlled primary schools in the Southern Education and Library Board area for the school year 1985-86 will result in a total reduction of four posts and no change in the number of remedial posts. These allocations may be altered as a result of appeals from the board.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the planned reduction in the primary teaching staff in the maintained sector in the Southern Education and Library Board area for the year 1985-86; and to what extent this will lead to a reduction in remedial teachers.

Mr. Scott: The present allocation of full-time teaching posts to maintained primary schools in the Southern Education and Library Board area for the school year 1985-86 will result in a total increase of four posts, including an increase of three in the number of remedial posts. These allocations may be altered as a result of appeals from the school authorities.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the planned reduction in primary teaching staff in the controlled sector in the Western Education and Library Board area for the year 1985-86; and to what extent this will lead to a reduction in remedial teachers.

Mr. Scott: The present allocation of full-time teaching posts to controlled primary schools in the Western Education and Library Board area for the school year 1985-86 will result in a total increase of nine posts, including an increase of one on the number of remedial posts. The allocations may be altered as a result of appeals from the board.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the planned reduction in primary teaching staff in the maintained sector in the Western Education and Library Board area for the year 1985-86; and to what extent this will lead to a reduction in remedial teachers.

Mr. Scott: The present allocation of full-time teaching posts to maintained primary schools in the Western Education and Library Board area for the school year 1985-86 will result in a total reduction of seven posts, including a reduction of one in the number of remedial posts. These allocations may be altered as a result of appeals from the school authorities.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the total number of remedial teachers employed in primary schools in the controlled sector in the Southern Education and Library Board area during each year since 1981;

(2) what was the total number of remedial teachers employed in primary schools in the controlled sector in the Western Education and Library Board area during each year since 1981;

(3) what was the total number of remedial teachers employed in primary schools in the maintained sector in the Southern Education and Library Board area during each year since 1981;

(4) what was the total number of remedial teachers employed in primary schools in the maintained sector in the Western Education and Library Board area during each year since 1981.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Full-Time Remedial Posts Allocated

School Year	Southern Board		Western Board
	Controlled	Maintained	Controlled	Maintained
1981-82	26	49	23	59
1982-83	26	52	19	63
1983-84	27	53	21	64
1984-85	28	53	21	61

Transport Bill

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if it is his intention to introduce all or any of the measures contained in the Transport Bill in Northern Ireland either by separate legislation or by Order in Council.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 18 February 1985, c. 376]: I will monitor the progress of the Transport Bill and will in due course consider the application of similar provisions to Northern Ireland, where relevant.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence what impact it is estimated that the purchase of Trident will have on the resources available for United Kingdom conventional defences.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) on 5 February, at column 520.

Iraqi Military Personnel

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Defence if training facilities are currently provided in the United Kingdom for Iraqi military personnel.

Mr. Lee: A small number of Iraqi military personnel are currently undergoing training at United Kingdom military training establishments. It is not our practice to reveal details of such training, since this information is confidential between Governments.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a final decision on whether the British Aerospace PC-9 proposal will be selected as the replacement Royal Air Force trainer aircraft.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement gave my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on 29 January 1985, at column 157.

Portsmouth Naval Base (Security)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will finance, or contribute to financing, security measures for Portsmouth naval base, in the area accommodating the Royal Navy museum, HMS Victory and the Mary Rose, and enable it to be accessible to the general public at all times irrespective of the security status of the rest of the naval base; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces is already discussing, with other interested parties, arrangements for facilitating public access to the part of the Portsmouth naval base containing the RN Museum, HMS Victory and the Mary Rose. Security is one of the elements being considered.

Security

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many investigations are at present being carried out into alleged breaches of security within the Ministry of Defence; and how many such investigations have happened over the past two years.

Mr. Lee: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Families (Aid)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to introduce a scheme of aid for families with children aged under five years similar to that operating in England.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am pleased to say that from 1 April we shall be making available a total of £300,000 for the three financial years 1985 to 1988. Funds provided for the Wales under-fives initiative will be primarily used to support innovatory projects in the voluntary sector which provide practical help for those with special problems, such as low income, parents isolated at home who find it difficult to cope whether in rural or urban areas, ethnic minority parents and children in women's refuges. The scheme will be administered by the Department with the aid of an advisory group of representatives from the voluntary and statutory sector to whom applications may be made as from today.

ENERGY

Gas Demand

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will publish his Department's latest estimate of gas demand in the United Kingdom between the current time and 2000.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My Department's latest projections of gas demand are those in its proof of evidence for the Sizewell B public inquiry, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Gas Reserves

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to the statement on the Sleipner gas contract, Official Report, 11 February, column 23, what percentage of the increased gas reserves of 6·2 trillion cubic feet is (a) probable, (b) proven, (c) in the southern basin, (d) in the northern basin, (e) condensate gas and (f) in fields larger than 0·5 and 0·75 trillion cubic feet, respectively.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Details of the full breakdown of my Department's latest estimates of United Kingdom gas reserves will be given in the 1985 report to Parliament on the development of oil and gas resources (the Brown Book).

Power Stations (Emissions)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has made any estimate of the capital and running costs and the energy penalty of installing (a) electrostatic precipitators to meet current standards for particular emissions and (b) the Wellman-Lord flue gas desulphurisation process, on a new 2000MW coal-fired power station.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB advises that, at 1983 prices, the capital cost of installing electrostatic precipitators to meet current standards for particulate emissions on a 2000MW coal-fired station is £16 million to £20 million. The running cost and energy penalty are negligible. The estimated capital cost of installing the Wellman-Lord flue gas desulphurisation process on a new station of this size would be £123 million. The estimated running cost would be about £30 million per annum accompanied by losses of about 4 per cent. or 76MW, in the station's output and of about 1·4 percentage points in its thermal efficiency.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has undertaken, or is undertaking, an investigation into the relative cost-effectiveness of reducing sulphur dioxide emissions by (a) flue gas desulphurisation and (b) positive electricity conservation measures.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB has examined the costs of various flue gas desulphurisation (fgd) processes. It advises that the average cost of reducing sulphur emissions by this means at existing power stations would be about £550 per tonne of sulphur abated. The amount and therefore cost of energy conservation measures necessary to achieve a similar reduction would depend upon how particular measures affected demand for electricity, the speed of take-up of these measures and the rate of economic growth during the period concerned.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Administration of Justice Bill

Mrs. Peacock asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on clause 43 of the Administration of Justice Bill [Lords].

The Attorney-General: I assume the question refers to the clause which was negatived at the Committee stage of the Bill in another place. I refer my hon. Friend to the amendment now tabled there in the name of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Clive Ponting (Trial)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Attorney-General whether he authorised the Director of Public Prosecutions to speak to the British Broadcasting Corporation radio and television on Sunday 17 February about the Ponting prosecution.

The Attorney-General: I was not consulted specifically about this interview before it was given, but the director has my general authority to give interviews of this kind whenever appropriate. I am completely content with what he said.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Drug Offenders

Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of those convicted for drug-related offences in each of the past five years who were registered drug addicts.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: This information is not available to my Department and I understand that the Scottish Home and Health Department is also unable to provide the information requested.

Fixed Penalty Notices

Mr. Wilson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many fixed penalty notices have been issued by procurators-fiscal under section 42 and schedule 2 to the Transport Act 1982; and on how many of these payment has been made.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Procurators fiscal may issue conditional offers of fixed penalty for the offences set out in both schedule 1 and schedule 2 to the Transport Act 1982. No separate figures are kept for schedule 2 offences. 58,233 offers were made in 1983 and 1984. Statistics on offers made and fixed penalties subsequently paid are as follows:

	Offers made	Fixed penalty paid
1983 (from inception on 30 June)	19,896	17,165
1984 (first three quarters)	29,705	25,844
1984 (total)	38,337	—

No figures are yet available for 1985.

The figures show that payment resulted in approximately 87 per cent. of cases.

PRIME MINISTER

West Balgrochan

Q48. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to West Balgrochan.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

General Belgrano

Q52. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister at what time on 30 April 1982 HMS Conqueror spotted the Argentine oiler which was accompanying the General Belgrano.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave him on 15 May 1984, at column 910.

The oiler was not sighted until 1 May 1982.

Parkhead

Q55. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to pay an official visit to Parkhead.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Welwyn Garden City

Q83. Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Welwyn Garden City.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Dartmouth

Q90. Mr. Steen asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Dartmouth.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 21 February.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 February.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 21 February.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 February.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 February.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is paying an official visit to the United States.

Civil Servants (Duties)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what guidance is given to civil servants on their respective duties to (a) the Government of the day and (b) the Crown in Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The main principles are set out in the introduction and paragraphs 9870-9871 and 9923 of the "Civil Service Pay and Conditions of Service Code". The duties of civil servants are further explained in the chapter "What is a civil servant?" In the "Handbook for the new civil servant" (Civil Service Department, 1980). The "Memorandum of Guidance for Officials Appearing Before Select Committees" (Civil Service Department, 1980) makes it clear that civil servants who give evidence to Select Committees do so on behalf of Ministers. Copies of all three are in the Library of the House.

Falklands War (Rules of Engagement)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the changes in the rules of engagement in May 1982 allowed for the sinking of the Argentine naval vessels anywhere outside the Argentine territorial waters regardless of their position vis-a-vis the task force.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend will reply to the hon. Member shortly.

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated cost of the Falkland Islands commitment in each of the next three years.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the projected expenditure on the defence of the Falkland Islands for each of the next 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: As announced in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428), the provision for Falklands costs included in the defence budget is £552 million in 1985-86, £450 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88. Funding thereafter will be determined during future public expenditure surveys.

Nerve Gases

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department holds stocks of any precursor chemicals which can be combined to make nerve gases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No. However, the chemical defence establishment holds very small quantities of precursor chemicals for laboratory research into chemical defence measures.

Defence Expenditure (Statistics)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information is available to him about the rate of growth of Soviet defence expenditure in the past decade; and what was the rate of growth in North Atlantic Treaty Organisation expenditure over the same period.

Mr. Stanley: It is estimated that Soviet defence expenditure has grown at an annual rate of about 2 per cent. in real terms since the mid-1970s. Details are in the essay at annex A to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984" (Cmnd. 9227-1). The equivalent figure for NATO is about 3 per cent. As the essay makes clear, comparisons in this area are difficult and relative financial growth rate statistics alone do not represent an accurate indicator of relative output or relative capability.

Recruitment

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the present levels of recruitment to the armed forces.

Mr. Lee: Overall recruitment to the armed services remains satisfactory. In 1983-84 some 37,000 men and women entered the armed services on regular engagements and this year we expect to recruit a similar number. Recruiting targets are generally being met except for some specific officer categories, technicians and skilled tradesmen.

Procurement Spending

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current projected percentage of procurement spending in the United Kingdom for 1984-85 on (a) conventional and (b) nuclear weapons.

Mr. Lee: It is not the practice to make available details of year-by-year expenditure on nuclear weapons. Estimated expenditure on the nuclear strategic force in 1984-85 is, however, shown in table 2.3 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984 (Vol. 2)" (Cmnd. 9227-11).

South Atlantic Campaign

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the South Atlantic campaign memorial will be unveiled.

Mr. Heseltine: I have already announced on 21 December 1984, at column 375, that the memorial will be unveiled in the crypt of St. Paul's cathedral. This will take place on 14 June 1985.

Departmental Services

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, pursuant to his reply of 6 February, Official Report, column 594, he will indicate (i) how the availability of spare capacity is identified and (ii) how marginal cost is calculated and whether account is taken of the ability of the purchaser of the service to pay; and if he will publish the guidelines for deciding whether significant publicity, recruiting, training or other defence benefits accrue to his Department from the services provided.

Mr. Lee: Spare capacity arises where resources can be made available without detriment to their primary defence role; for example, where standby capacity is maintained, or where the defence demand is variable. Availability is frequently identified as part of normal management responsibilities, with account being taken of the scope in the longer term for matching capacity more precisely to the requirement.

Marginal cost is calculated by assessing the elements attributable to the service in question, taking account in particular of the time scale involved. Market considerations, such as ability to pay, can play a part in fixing a charge, provided that there is a defence interest in providing the service at all, and that there is no loss to defence funds. A judgment on whether significant benefits accrue to MOD is made on a case by case basis. No central document lays down general guidance.

Teachers (Overseas Schools)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the review of allowances to teachers working in schools overseas which are run by his Department.

Mr. Lee: Allowances for all Home civil servants working overseas, including teachers employed by MOD, are reviewed every three or four years. Reviews are carried out by Treasury inspectors or by FCO inspectors on behalf of the Treasury, in accordance with arrangements agreed directly between the Treasury and the Council of Civil Service Unions.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the terms of employment for teachers working in schools overseas which are run by his Department.

Mr. Lee: United Kingdom based teachers working in service children's schools overseas are employed on three-year engagements as temporary civil servants. Their conditions of service are governed by regulations applicable to MOD United Kingdom based civilians serving abroad. They are paid in accordance with the current scales of salary for teachers in primary and secondary education, England and Wales — Burnham rates—and also receive London area allowance.

In common with other MOD civilians serving overseas, teachers are provided with free accommodation, and, depending on the country in which they serve, a tax-free foreign service allowance.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations were carried out by his Department during the review of allowances paid to teachers working overseas in schools run by his Department.

Mr. Lee: Detailed consultations are held during overseas inspections between inspectors and local representatives of the Council of Civil Service Unions. Individual Departments are not directly consulted.

HMS Fearless and Intrepid

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether he has come to a decision with regard to the extension, refit, or replacement of HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to announce a decision regarding the extension, refit or replacement of HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what factors he is taking into account in coming to a decision on the extension, refit or replacement of HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: HMS Intrepid is undergoing a refit at present; HMS Fearless is planned to have a similar refit in 1987.

As I said in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on 24 July 1984, at column 601, we are currently examining the provision of future amphibious capability, including the question of replacing HMS Intrepid and HMS Fearless once they come to the end of their planned lives in the mid-1990s.

Cadet Force Officers

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by Army district (a) the total number of instances of and, (b) the total amount involved in, claims submitted in respect of combined cadet force officers for training reported as having been carried out after the date of retirement or relinquishment of commissions of the officers concerned, over the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Lee: No such claims have been submitted. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces is writing to the hon. Member.

Gateway House Hotel, Brize Norton

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the cockroaches in the kitchens of the Gateway House hotel, Royal Air Force, Brize Norton, have been eradicated.

Mr. Lee: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will investigate the matter and write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Seat Belts

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to introduce regulations requiring the mandatory fitting of rear seat belts in new cars.

Mrs. Chalker: A decision will be announced as part of the Government's response to the recent report on road safety by the Select Committee on Transport, which I am now considering.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the observance by front seat car passengers of the legislation on the wearing of seat belts; and what figures he has for the numbers who have been prosecuted within the last 12 months for breach of the legislation.

Mrs. Chalker: The wearing rate for front seat passengers has overall been around 95 per cent. since the law's introduction. I am satisfied with this, but it is essential that it should be maintained. Information on prosecutions is not yet available for 1984, nor is it broken down between passengers and drivers. However, in 1983, 6,826 people were prosecuted for failing to wear a seat belt and a further 83 for permitting a child under 14 to ride in a front seat unbelted.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now announce his decision on the inspector's report on stage 2a of the north Devon link road or give a date when this result will be announced.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The inspector's report is still being considered. I am sorry that I cannot yet give my hon. Friend a date by which the joint decision will be announced.

Rail Accident, Severn Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what inquiries he has made concerning the death of four British Rail staff at the Severn tunnel junction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: In the early hours of Monday 11 February a gang of six permanent way men were clearing snow from the points at Severn tunnel junction when they were run down by a train. Regrettably, four of the men, including the man in charge, were killed. The Railway Inspectorate is currently investigating the accident under the powers of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 569, why no charge is made for publication of results of research at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory nor for the control and routeing of abnormal indivisible loads; and what is the extent of the shortfall in cost recovery for each of the services listed in part (b) of his answer.

Mr. Ridley: My answer given on 6 February, at columns 560-62, to my hon. Friend related to 1983-84. Since 1 January 1985, charges have been made for the publication of the results of research at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, set so as to recover the marginal cost of making the information available. The control and routeing of vehicles carrying abnormal indivisible loads forms part of the Department's regulatory control of the construction and use of vehicles of all classes. Departmental costs, along with those of the police and local authorities, are counted as part of the road track costs covered by general vehicle taxation.

My Department's total income from all fees and charges in 1983-84 was just over £80 million which represented a surplus of £2·5 million over costs of the services covered. For some of the services for which costs were not fully recovered in 1983-84 fee increases already introduced will lead to full cost recovery in 1985-86. These, with figures for the shortfall of the income compared to total costs in 1983-84, are as follows:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
Public Service Vehicle type and initial fitness testing	290	75
Public Service Vehicle driver testing	40	12
Supervision of Approved Training Bodies for motorcycle Part 1 test	117	22
Register of Approved Driving Instructors	287	22

For other services, fee increases which will provide full recovery of costs are under consideration:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
Public Service Vehicle driver licensing	516	74
Heavy Goods Vehicle driver licensing	408	20

In the majority of the remaining services charges are set to recover full costs and the shortfalls arose because of variances from forecasts or adjustments between years:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
International Civil Aviation organisation
Air Navigation Services (North Atlantic)	109	15
Commonwealth Air Transport Council	4	3
Marine surveys	71	3
Examination and certification of seamen	14	1
Vehicle and component approvals	61	3

For two services charges have been deliberately set below full cost recovery to mitigate the impact on the industry or the public:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
Fishing vessel surveys	550	83
Motorcycle Part 1 rider testing by the Department	286	58

One service will be significantly affected by provisions in the Transport Bill currently being considered by Parliament, and I have therefore postponed further considerations of the fee:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
Road service licences	785	75

In one case a public inquiry has been held and I shall be announcing a decision on charges shortly:

	£000	As percentage of total costs
Severn Bridge tolled crossing (1982-83 figures)	4,486	61

The standby costs of marine pollution services are borne by public funds, but the aim is to recover the total costs of responding to incidents from insurance claims. In 1983-84 total costs of the service were £2,105,000 and recoveries from claims £886,000. Delays in settling claims mean that there is no direct link between costs and income in an individual financial year.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Education Expenditure

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the United Kingdom's gross national product is spent on education compared with other European Economic Community countries.

Sir Keith Joseph: The latest information available in the Department relates to 1980-81 and is as follows:

	Education as percentage of GNP
United Kingdom	5·5
Belgium	6·0
Denmark	6·9
France	5·1
West Germany	4·7
Greece*	2·2
Ireland	7·0
Italy*	5·0
Luxembourg	5·7
Netherlands	7·9

* Information for Greece and Italy relates to 1979

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from local authorities about the level of expenditure on education services in 1984-85.

Mr. Dunn: Each year representatives of the local authority associations hold detailed discussions with officials of the Department, within the machinery of the consultative council on local government finance, about the level of local authority expenditure on education services in the following year. In addition, the Department receives a good many letters from individual local authorities on expenditure issues in each financial year.

Engineering Undergraduates

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many engineering undergraduates there are expected to be in British universities and polytechnics by 1985; and how this compares with the number there was in 1979.

Mr. Brooke: There were 53,000 full-time and sandwich undergraduates on engineering and technology courses in British universities and English polytechnics in 1983. Figures are not yet available but a further increase is expected for 1984. The corresponding figure for 1979 was 50,300. The numbers of part-time undergraduates were 3,000 and 2,200 in 1983 and 1979, respectively.

Higher Education

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for funding higher education.

Human Rights

Mr. Budgen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received the tenth annual report of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The report has been published today, and copies have been laid before Parliament. It covers the period 1 November 1983 to 31 October 1984.

The report focuses mainly on emergency legislation and electoral law but also covers a wide range of other matters which the Commission has considered over the year under review. These include divorce law, race relations legislation, community relations, young offenders and young persons in care and the Government's position in relation to the European Convention on Human Rights. The report concludes by proposing a review of the case for a Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland.

Copies of my response to the Commission's report have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to the proposed general study by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, designed to increase the protection of human rights in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: The chairman of the Commission has informed me that the Commission intends as a priority to undertake a major study to examine the adequacy and effectiveness of existing laws and institutions in securing freedom from discrimination and furthering equality of opportunity in Northern Ireland. The study will include the detailed examination of the provisions of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973, the legislation which established the offices of the Northern Ireland Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Commissioner for Complaints and the Fair Employment Agency as well as the relevant responsibilities of such bodies as the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and of the Commission itself. The Government share the Commission's commitment to further human rights in the interesrts of all the people of Northern Ireland. I therefore welcome and support the Commission's decision to undertake the proposed study and I look forward to receiving its report on this subject.

Terrorism

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the number of terrorist incidents in each year since 1 January 1980.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1985, c. 450]: The number of terrorist incidents* which occurred in Northern Ireland between 1980 and 1984 were as follows:

Year	Total
1980	1,044
1981	1,720
1982	915
1983	834
1984	592

* These incidents comprise shooting and bombing attacks against the security forces and civilians; the recovery of unexploded devices; and bombing and incendiary attacks against private and commercial property.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Customs and Excise (Staff)

4. Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the proposed establishment, in the next financial year, for Her Majesty's Customs and Excise uniformed officers in Dartmouth and Salcombe, respectively; and how this level compares with the establishment in each of the last three years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Three uniformed officers at Dartmouth, and two at Salcombe, which is the same level as for each of the last three years.

Budget (Representations)

14. Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the current year, he has received more, less, or about the average number of pre-budget representations; and what he deduces from this position.

Mr. Hayhoe: We have received many more representations about the Budget this year, perhaps because speculation and lobbying has been well above average.

Public Expenditure and Taxation

15. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the relative merits of (a) tax reductions for low income earners and (b) increased public expenditure in helping to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Lawson: The answer depends on whether employment is likely to grow faster in a high tax or a low tax economy. The Government take the view that, other things being equal, a low tax economy is likely to show greater dynamism, and thus be better for jobs than a high tax economy.

Value Added Tax

16. Mr. Barron asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on representations he has received on the addition of value added tax on newsprint.

Mr. Hayhoe: Newsprint already bears VAT at the standard rate.

30. Sir John Farr asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received in relation to the possible imposition of value added tax on children's footwear.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers have received some 370 letters.

39. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was raised in each of the last five financial years from value added tax on riding hats; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that information is not available from which to provide an estimate. The reasons are given in my reply to my hon. Friend on 19 November 1984 at column 43.

22. Mr. Hicks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the number of representations that he has received about extending value added tax to include books, newspapers and periodicals; and how many of these have been in favour of the proposition and how many against.

61. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received concerning value added tax on books.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn).

Economic Growth

17. Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is currently the major impediment to economic growth.

Mr. Peter Rees: There has been healthy sustained growth since 1981, but currently the coal strike is the major impediment to yet better performance.

Married Man's Tax Allowance

18. Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received calling for the phasing out of the married man's tax allowance.

Mr. Moore: I received a number of representations making this suggestion during the past 12 months.

Coal Industry Dispute

19. Mr. Flannery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to date in lost income tax revenue of the coal strike.

Mr. Moore: There are revenue gains as well as losses arising from the coal strike, but up to the end of 1984, the direct loss of income tax revenue from miners on strike is estimate to be between £150 million and £200 million.

Income Tax and National Insurance

20. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what current level of annual salary a single man is paying less in income tax and national insurance in real terms than in 1979.

Mr. Moore: In 1984-85, a single man whose earnings have increased in line with the average will pay a smaller proportion of his earnings in income tax and national insurance contributions than in 1978-79, if he is earning over £22,000 a year. At all income levels, those whose earnings have risen in line with the national average have seen a real increase in their take-home pay since 1978-79.

Interest Rates

21. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take to reduce the level of interest rates.

Mr. Lawson: Interest rates will be at whatever level is required to secure sound money and continued downward pressure on inflation.

EC (Budgetary Discipline)

23. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied that the effective budgetary discipline laid down by the Government as a condition for increasing the Common Market's own resources is being fulfilled by the Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Commission last year specifically endorsed those parts of the budgetary discipline agreement that apply to it. They have stated that the 1985 agricultural price proposals have been put forward in accordance with budgetary discipline.

Unemployment (Labour Costs)

24. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicated how far he estimates labour costs would need to fall for unemployment to halve.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury estimates indicate that if real wages had remained constant since 1981 instead of rising by about 3 per cent. a year employment might in time have been 1 million to 2 million higher.

Mortgages (Income Tax Relief)

25. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average amount of income tax relief on interest paid to owner-occupiers who have mortgages; and what has been the increase since 1979.

Mr. Moore: The average cost of mortgage interest relief per mortgagor is about £500 in 1984-85 compared with £200 in 1978-79.

Shipping Industry

26. Mr. Hill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received since 1 January about the fiscal treatment of the United Kingdom shipping industry.

Mr. Moore: A number of such representations has been received. These are being carefully considered.

Exchange Rates

27. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of sterling exchange rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have nothing to add to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statements to the House on 14 and 29 January and his evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on 28 January.

31. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Her Majesty's Treasury uses any index of the effective sterling exchange rate separate from that published daily by the Bank of England.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The sterling exchange rate index, formerly known as sterling's effective exchange rate, is published by the Bank of England at 8.30 am and thereafter hourly from 9 am to 4 pm inclusive. Monthly averages for sterling's trade-weighted index against currencies in the EMS exchange rate mechanism are published in the CSO's "Financial Statistics."

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the change in the nominal and real exchange rates for the pound sterling compared with the deutschmark since March 1983; and what is the corresponding increase or decrease in base rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

Percentage changes since March 1983

	per cent.
Nominal DM/£ exchange rate*	− ½
Real DM/£ exchange rate†	+7½
United Kingdom base rates‡ ,	+3

* Up to January 1985.
† ie. the nominal rate adjusted for movements in producer prices in the two countries up to November 1984 (latest available data).
‡ Percentage point change since 1 March 1983.

Such comparisons can be misleading, as they are highly sensitive to the particular time period chosen.

Minimum Lending Rate

28. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual cost to industry of each 1 per cent. increase in minimum lending rate.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Bank of England ceased to post a continuous minimum lending rate on 20 August 1981. It announced a minimum lending rate of 12 per cent. on 14 January for that day only. As far as bank base rates are concerned, the annual cost of each 1 per cent. rise in terms of higher net interest payments of industrial and commercial companies is about £250 million.

38. Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for reducing minimum lending rate.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Bank of England on 20 August 1981 ceased to post a continuous minimum lending rate. It announced a minimum lending rate of 12 per cent. on 14 January for that day only. As to the Government's approach to interest rates generally, it is that they should be at whatever level is necessary to secure sound monetary conditions and continuing downward financial pressure on inflation. That is the only way to achieve a sustained reduction in interest rates.

Economic Activity

29. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there have been any further signs of an increase in economic activity.

Mr. Peter Rees: Yes. Non-oil export volumes rose 9½ per cent. in real terms in 1984. GDP on the output measure rose by 2½ per cent. in 1984 compared with 1983.

Government Spending

32. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures will be taken by his Department following the conclusions of the report on Government spending.

Mr. Peter Rees: The Treasury is preparing action documents by 1 April. It is too early to say what detailed changes may be made to the management of departmental procurement as a result of the report.

Pensions

33. Mr. Mikardo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from the Trades Union Congress and individual trade unions about the possible proposals to tax pensions benefits.

59. Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about the taxation of capital pension payments.

Mr. Moore: A considerable number of letters about pension provisions has been received, in addition to representations from various trade associations, trades unions and other representative bodies.

Mr. Brooke: Improvements are needed to secure greater selectivity in funding and greater attention to cost-effectiveness and value for money. These issues will be discussed in the Green Paper on the future development of higher education to be published later this year.

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the percentage of 18-year-olds currently participating in higher education in England and Wales; and how this figure compares with other member countries of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Brooke: The available information is as follows:

	Age range	*Participation rate (1981-82)
France	18-20	34·0
Germany	19-21	†19·5
Italy	19-21	25·1
Netherlands	18-20	25·7
United Kingdom	18-19	31·4

* New entrants (all ages) to full-time and part-time higher education as a percentage of the average population in the most relevant age range.
† 1980

Information for other member states in the Community is not readily available.

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the retention of sixth forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities wishing to terminate sixth form provision in 11 to 18 schools must publish proposals under section 12 of the Education Act 1980. The Department's circular 4/82 makes it clear that my right hon. Friend would not normally approve proposals which have as their consequence the closure or significant change of character of schools which, by a sustained record of success in the provision made for sixth form education, had already proved their worth under existing arrangements, and in his judgment could continue to do so, except where he was satisfied that the prima facie case for their retention was displaced by other compelling educational considerations.

Secondary Education (Rochdale)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to complete his consultations on the Rochdale education authority's proposals for the reorganisation of secondary education; and if he will announce his decision in time for the planned implementation.

Mr. Dunn: No proposals for the reorganisation of secondary education have been published by the Rochdale local education authority.

Primary Schools

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in England in real terms in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how much was spent per pupil in the primary schools in the Rochdale metropolitan district.

Mr. Dunn: The net institutional recurrent expenditure per primary school pupil in 1982-83, the latest date for which full information is available, was, in 1984-85 real terms, £745 for England and £735 for Rochdale.

School Closures, Staffordshire

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he proposes to publish his decision in respect of the proposals for school closures by the Staffordshire education committee in the following areas: (a) Stoke on Trent, (b) Burton on Trent and (c) Rugeley.

Mr. Dunn: Staffordshire county council was informed today that my right hon. Friend has approved its proposals for the reorganisation of secondary schools in Rugeley. He is aware that the authority is concerned to receive his decisions on the other proposals to which the hon. Member refers; the council will be informed of these as soon as he has completed his consideration of each case.

Manchester (Education Capital Allowance)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had from the town clerk of Manchester regarding the education capital allocation to the City of Manchester for 1985-86; what reply he is sending; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I received a letter from the town clerk of Manchester on 18 February expressing the serious concern of the education committee of the City of Manchester about the size of the authority's education capital allocation for 1985-86 and seeking an increase in that allocation. Officials of the Department are arranging to meet officers of the authority at an early date to discuss the issues raised in the letter.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

St. Helena

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the production of fresh milk has been discontinued on the island of St. Helena.

Mr. Renton: The St. Helena Government closed the island's only dairy for economic reasons in 1983. It was operating on a continuous deficit because of high production and distribution costs, low demand, and a local preference for the cheaper and more convenient condensed and powdered milks which are in plentiful supply from the United Kingdom.

ENVIRONMENT

National Heritage

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further help he intends to give the National Heritage Memorial Fund to continue the work of preserving the national heritage.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government recognise as an important part of the national heritage the Adam masterpiece of Kedleston Hall, Derbyshire, the contents and grounds of Weston Park, Shropshire, and the furniture made by Thomas Chippendale for Nostell Priory in Yorkshire. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts and I accept that the complex negotiations needed to secure the future of these properties will make heavy calls on the National Heritage Memorial Fund on top of the other varied demands facing the fund. The Government are therefore to provide the fund with additional resources. This will mean that, if no other source of funds is available, the fund will be in a position to negotiate solutions which preserve these three estates at reasonable cost to the taxpayer.

The purpose of these negotiations will be to bring about arrangements to transfer the properties by private treaty to institutions concerned with their preservation and public enjoyment. The transfer values will take into account the owners' liability to capital taxes. If these negotiations succeed, the general public will benefit by securing access to three important collections at considerable less cost than would have been possible on the open market.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the provision for grant-in-aid to the National Heritage Memorial Fund will be increased to £29 million for 1984-85. £3 million of this will be funded from savings elsewhere. Within Class VIII, Vote 4 there will be an increase in the cash limit of £22 million. £7 million of this will be secured through economies in the Department's running costs on Class VIII, Vote 5, and £15 million from a reduction on the New Town Non-voted cash limit DOE/NT 1. There will therefore be no overall increase in public expenditure. The effect of these changes on the relevant cash limit are as set out in the following table:

	Existing Cash Limit	Increase Decrease	Revised Cash Limit
Class VIII Vote 4	92,963	+22,000	114,963
Class VIII Vote 5	171,995	− 7,000	164,995
Non-voted cash limit DOE NT 1	46,700	−15,000	31,700

West Midlands (Industrial Land)

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the amount of derelict industrial land in the West Midlands county council area.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not available in the form requested. The land in the 1982 derelict land survey is not broken down sufficiently to identify that which is industrial. There are, however, 2,000 acres in the West Midlands county council area listed in the survey under the "other" category, which includes industrial dereliction. A copy of the 1982 survey is available in the Library.

Lead Pollution

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) Official Report, 12 February, column 86, if he will quantify the substantial reduction in concentrations of lead in the air to which he referred.

Mr. Waldegrave: Most of the lead in urban air is derived from lead in petrol. It is self-evident that a substantial reduction in the lead content of petrol will have a substantial effect on the concentrations of lead in urban air. However, there are many uncertainties in quantifying this relationship, and I prefer to await the results of the monitoring programme now under way than to speculate on the actual size of the reductions. Improvements in air quality as a result of the proposed stricter emission controls on lead works will be local and will vary with the local circumstances.

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has about the effect of reductions in the lead content of petrol in other countries on the concentrations of lead in the air.

Mr. Waldegrave: The evidence on the reductions found in other countries is limited and its relevance to the United Kingdom is uncertain because of differing local conditions. Probably the most relevant information is that from Germany. In Frankfurt, after the lead content of petrol was reduced from 0·4 to 0·15 grammes per litre, lead in air concentrations at a typical city centre site fell by about 75 per cent. at street level. The reported reduction in an outer suburb was 35 per cent.

Council House Sales

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities exercise the discretion given to them to make grants to assist tenants in their legal costs in exercising the right to buy their homes.

Sir George Young: Section 21 of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984 gives local authorities a discretionary power to contribute towards the costs incurred by a council tenant or former tenant in obtaining a private sector mortgage. Information on the number of authorities currently using this power is not available.

Property Disposal

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to ensure that all consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 are processed within one month of submission.

Sir George Young: In the period up to 31 January 1985, 78 per cent. of section 8 applications were processed within four weeks and 92 per cent. within five weeks.

Applications are dealt with expeditiously, but a small minority of applications can remain outstanding for substantial periods pending the receipt of adequate supporting information from the authorities concerned.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those sites of special scientific interest damaged or destroyed by pesticides since renotification under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write shortly to my hon. Friend with details for England and Scotland. For Wales I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Wales, to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 18 December 1984, at columns 77-78.

Metropolitan County Councils (Revenue Costs)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide the total revenue cost for 1983-84 in each of the metropolitan county councils for (a) planning, (b) highways and (c) central administration and express those revenue costs as a percentage of the overall revenue budget for each metropolitan county council.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the available information derived from the latest outturn data supplied by the metropolitan county councils:

Gross revenue rate fund expenditure in cash and as a percentage of aggregate gross revenue rate fund expenditure for 1983-84

Local Authority Expenditure (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the outturn of gross revenue expenditure and income was for each London borough and the City of London by service and for all services in 1982-83.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, Friday 30 January 1985, c. 172]: I have today placed the requested information in the Library. The information has been based on the 1982-83 outturn data supplied by local authorities.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Anti-terrorist Measures (Co-operation)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will identify those countries in the list provided in response to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson) Official Report, 31 January, columns 274-75, which he has approached in the last six months seeking co-operation over anti-terrorist measures; and which countries have (a) responded constructively, (b) responded in a disappointing manner and (c) not responded at all.

Mr. Renton: Discussions have taken place with partners in the Ten, Council of Europe, NATO, the Economic Summit Seven and with a number of other countries on a bilateral basis. These diplomatic exchanges have been encouraging, and no country has responded unconstructively about co-operation. Their content must naturally remain confidential.

Ascension Island

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many wild cats he estimates there are on Ascension Island; and whether or not this number is declining.

Mr. Renton: No estimate of numbers is available, but the population is thought to be increasing at present.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who is responsible for the police at Ascension Island; and who is the magistrate.

Mr. Renton: The governor of St. Helena is responsible for the police. His authority is exercised by the administrator. The administrator acts as the magistrate.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Foreign Affairs Council of 18 and 19 February.

Mr. Rifkind: With my right hon. and learned Friend, I attended the Foreign Affairs Council in Brussels on 18-19 February. Ministerial meetings were held with Spain and Portugal.

The Council had further discussions of its position for the negotiations with Spain and Portugal. The main subject discussed was fisheries; the Council considered possible ways of achieving transitional arrangements which took account of the legitimate expectations of the applicant countries without jeopardising the balance of fishing opportunities for existing member states under the common fisheries policy. It was agreed to continue discussion at an additional meeting of the Council, to be held on 28 February.

There was a further round of discussions about the financing of the 1985 budget. A Presidency proposal is now being considered and the Council will return to the question at its next meeting.

The 1985 food aid implementing regulation was adopted by the Council. My right hon. and learned Friend took the opportunity to express concern to the Commission and to his colleagues at the rate at which food aid is being delivered to Sudan, and stressed the need to speed up procedures.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the average period between remand and trial for prisoners refused bail and charged with scheduled offences in Northern Ireland in 1984;

(2) for 1984, what was the average length of time that prisoners spent on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: Complete figures for 1984 are not yet available. However, for the period January to October 1984, the average lengths of time from first remand to termination of trial, including periods spent on bail, were as follows:

	Number of weeks
All persons	37
Persons charged with scheduled offences	44
Persons charged with non-scheduled offences	27

Excluding periods spent on bail, the comparable figures were 39·7 weeks for those charged with scheduled offences, and 11·3 weeks for those charged with non-scheduled offences.

For those persons charged with scheduled offences who were in custody at the time of trial and who had never been released on bail, the average period between first remand and termination of trial in 1984 was 36·6 weeks.

Roancabin Ltd.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide details of all portable accommodation units supplied to Government Departments and agencies by Roancabin Ltd. in the past three years and the current financial year to date.

Mr. Scott: The information is respect of such units supplied to the Northern Ireland Office, the Northern Ireland Departments and their agencies is as follows:

Financial year	Number of units
1981-82	14
1982-83	10
1983-84	20
1984-85*	7

* To date.

Oxygen Supplies

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many patients in each of the Northern Ireland health and social services boards are supplied with oxygen by community pharmacists; what is the estimated cost of this service; and if he ensures that patients in rural areas are given adequate cover.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows for the 12-month period December 1983 to November 1984:

	Number of patients supplied	Cost £
Eastern board	608	185,996
Northern board	245	60,009
Southern board	193	53,504
Western board	166	108,261

I am satisfied that all patients receive adequate service.

Strip Searches

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many remand prisoners have been subjected to strip searches in each of the past three years; and what is the total number of strip searches of remand prisoners.

Mr. Scott: Records are available only in respect of female remand prisoners at Her Majesty's prison Armagh since 1 June 1984. These are as follows:

Month	Number of searches of women remand prisoners
June 1984	2
July 1984	5
August 1984	2
September 1984	2
October 1984	2
November 1984	2
December 1984	1
January 1985	2

No prisoner was searched more than once in any calendar month.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in what situations it is the policy for strip searching of prisoners to be carried out on a random basis.

Mr. Scott: Randon strip searches are conducted when required to maintain security and deter the carrying of illicit articles.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many individual strip searches in each of the past three years were ordered by prison governors;

(2) how many individual inmates were selected for strip searching in each of the past three years by (a) members of the governing grades other than prison governors and (b) uniformed officers; and how many of these inmates were remand prisoners.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the instructions given to staff who carry out strip searches explaining how the searches are to be carried out.

Mr. Scott: The general principles are set out in rule 9 of the Prison Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982 and rule 10 of the Young Offenders Centre Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982 which provide that a prisoner shall be searched in as seemly a manner as is consistent with discovering anything concealed, that a prisoner shall not be given a strip search in the sight of another prisoner, and that a search shall not be conducted by or in the presence of an officer of the opposite sex. The more detailed procedural instructions given to prison officers require two officers to be in attendance to permit the checking of clothing and a brief visual search.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the policy he has laid down regarding strip searches within which prison governors are responsible for such searches.

Mr. Scott: Under the policy approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, prisoners are routinely strip-searched on admission to and discharge from prison and before going on inter-prison visits. On other occasions the searches are carried out on a random basis.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing prison rules in accordance with which strip searching may be carried out on a random basis and responsibility for selecting inmates delegated to uniformed officers.

Mr. Scott: Rule 9 of the Prison Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982 provides for prisoners to be searched by an officer on reception into prison, and at such subsequent times as the governor may authorise subject to any direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many complaints have been made against members of staff arising out of strip searches in each of the past three years.

Mr. Scott: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost, but so far as I am aware there have been few complaints directed against members of staff as a result of strip searches.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining the complaints procedure within Northern Ireland prisons detailing how complaints arising out of strip searches are processed; with whom the complaint must be lodged; who investigates the complaint; what evidence is taken into consideration;what right of representation the complainant has; and who or what authority decides whether the complaint is upheld and whether action should be taken against a member of staff.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions a prison governor has drawn the attention of the medical officer to a prisoner whose physical or mental condition appeared to require attention during or following a strip search.

Mr. Scott: I am not aware of any such occasions.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches took place in January; how many prisoners were involved; and how many of these were remand prisoners.

Mr. Scott: Records are available only in respect of female prisoners at Her Majesty's prison Armagh. During January 1985, 36 searches were carried out on 26 women. Individual prisoners were searched the following number of times:

Number of prisoners	Number of searches in each case

* This figure includes two remand prisoners each of whom was searched once.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many complaints have been received in each of the past three years regarding the alleged presence or conduct of male prison officers during strip searches of women prisoners.

Mr. Scott: As I said in my answer to the hon. Gentleman on 29 January, at column 142 male officers have never been present during such searches. I am unaware of any complaints concerning their alleged presence or conduct from persons with direct knowledge of the search arrangements.

Prison Staff (Code of Discipline)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the code of discipline for prison staff in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Rule 94 of the Prison Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982 and rule 95 of the Young Offenders Centre Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982 provide for a code of discipline which sets out offences against discipline with which prison officers may be charged. Such offences include neglect of duty and offences of dishonesty; discreditable or insubordinate conduct; disobedience to orders; improper relations with prisoners or ex-prisoners; and unlawful or unnecessary exercise of authority. The code also details the procedures for dealing with such charges, the disciplinary awards which may be made and the rights of appeal.

Primary, Secondary and Grammar Schools

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list in the Official Report the (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) grammar schools which will have their teaching staff cut for the coming school year, indicating the job loss in each school, and whether the schools are voluntary, controlled or maintained and the drop in pupil numbers in each case.

Mr. Scott: The schools in which the present allocations of full-time teaching posts for the school year 1985-86 will result in a reduction are listed. These allocations may be altered as a result of the consideration of appeals received from school authorities. About 50 posts have been held for this purpose.

*Affected by redeployment following the closure of Park Parade Secondary School on 31 August 1984.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list, by education board area, the (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) grammar schools in Northern Ireland which have been granted discretionary posts for the coming school year; which of those schools are voluntary, controlled and maintained; and how many such posts were available, how many have been distributed and how many are in reserve.

Mr. Scott: The schools which have been allocated full-time discretionary posts for the school year 1985-86 are listed. In each sector the number of discretionary posts available depends on the total number of posts allocated to that sector and the number of posts for which schools qualify as basic entitlements under the various agreed formulae. The relevant information is as follows:

	Total Posts	Basic Entitlements	Discretionary Posts	Already Allocated	Held For Appeals
Primary Schools	7,544	6,484	1,060	1,040	20
Secondary Schools (Including Grammar)	10,119	9,928	191	161	30

In the primary sector, 399 posts for remedial education are included in the number of discretionary posts already allocated. In the secondary sector posts for remedial education are included in the basic entitlement.

Manufacturing Production

34. Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement concerning the most recent figures for United Kingdom manufacturing production.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter).

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

35. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the outturn for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave an estimate in his autumn statement. He will give another in his Budget statement.

Industrial Premises

36. Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating changes in taxation intended to encourage the modernisation of old industrial premises.

Mr. Moore: No recent suggestions specifically advocating such changes have been received.

Black Economy

37. Mr. Alexander asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further steps he is taking to bring the earnings of those engaged in the black economy into taxation.

Mr. Moore: The methods used to counter tax evasion are always under careful review. On staffing I have nothing to add to the details given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on 15 November 1984.

European Monetary System

40. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has conducted studies into the benefits of joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system in the light of the present value of the pound sterling.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As has been made clear on a number of occasions, the question of participation, which gives rise to a wide spectrum of considerations, is kept under review.

Inflation

41. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current rate of inflation.

44. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of inflation.

Mr. Peter Rees: The increase in the retail prices index was 4·6 per cent. over the 12 months to December 1984.

65. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to revise his forecasts for inflation following recent exchange rate falls and interest rate rises.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's next forecast of inflation will be published in this year's financial statement and Budget report.

Drink and Tobacco

42. Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has recently received concerning duty on drink and tobacco.

Mr. Hayhoe: Many and from a variety of sources.

Keith Committee (VAT)

43. Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received with regard to the recommendations of the Keith committee on value added tax as far as the licensed trade is concerned.

Mr. Hayhoe: Customs and Excise has not been able to trace any such representations from any organisation exclusively representing the liquor licence trade. A submission has, however, been received from a hotel group. No individuals making representations have been identified as having a connection with the licensed trade.

Social Security Expenditure

45. Mr. McKelvey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will revise his forecast of the level of social security expenditure in the light of the current trend in the level of unemployment.

Mr. Peter Rees: The assumption used in preparing the projections of social security expenditure in Cmnd. 9428 is that unemployment in Great Britain, excluding school leavers, adult students and those temporarily stopped, averages 3 million in 1984-85 and subsequent years. The assumption for 1984-85 is entirely consistent with recent trends, and I see no reason to change it. The flat path assumed thereafter follows the usual convention and is neither a forecast nor a prediction. Table 3.12.8 in Cmnd. 9428 indicates the effect on social security expenditure of a change in the level of unemployment.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 1 February, Official Report, column 335, what proportion of gross domestic product at market prices was allocated to expenditure on social security in 1960, 1970, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Peter Rees: Expenditure on social security since 1979-80 was published in table 2.5 of the public expenditure White Paper Cmnd. 9428. Gross domestic product at market prices is published quarterly in Economic Trends. Social security payments are transfer payments and therefore do not form part of gross domestic product. However, if social security is expressed as a percentage of GDP the following estimates are obtained:

	per cent.
1960	5·8
1970	7·6
1979-80	9·7
1980-81	10·2
1981-82	11·3
1982-83	11·8
1983-84	11·9

Local Authority Capital Investment

46. Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the implications for Government economic planning of the level of local authority capital investment.

Mr. Peter Rees: Local authority capital spending is one component of total public expenditure. Control of total public expenditure is an important component of the Government's economic policies which are bringing about sustained economic recovery.

Debt Rescheduling

47. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet other Finance Ministers regarding those countries rescheduling debt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer regularly meets Finance Ministers from other countries to discuss a wide range of topics, including international debt. The IMF interim committee and IMF/IBRD development committee meetings take place on 17 to 19 April and the debt situation will be discussed there.

Unemployment

48. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why unemployment is continuing to rise.

Mr. Peter Rees: Unemployment is still rising because the majority of pay settlements are still too high.

51. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumption he has made of the trend in the level of unemployment in the next year in drawing up his public expenditure plans.

Mr. Peter Rees: In preparing the projections of social security expenditure, it is assumed that unemployment in Great Britain, excluding school leavers, adult students and those temporarily stopped will average 3 million. This is neither a forecast nor a prediction. The actual level of unemployment will depend on developments in the world economy and at home.

56. Mr. Hayes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has that tax cuts in isolation will make a significant inroad into unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Tax cuts can be expected to boost employment by reducing pressure on wages and through generally improving incentives and increasing the rewards for enterprise and effort. The effect on wages is generally incorporated in macroeconomic models, including the Treasury's. The other effects are by their nature difficult to quantify.

58. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will explain on what basis the Government Actuary's assumption for unemployment contained in the 1984 Autumn Statement was made.

Mr. Moore: The working assumption used by the Government Actuary in the report referred to in part 3 of the Autumn Statement is that the number of unemployed in Great Britain claiming benefit, excluding school leavers, adult students and persons whose unemployment has temporarily stopped, averages 3 million in both 1984-85 and 1985-86. The assumption for 1984-85 was based on recent trends in the level of unemployment. A flat path was assumed through 1985-86, following the usual convention.

Privatisation

49. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the net contribution to the Exchequer from privatisation in 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84, respectively.

Mr. Moore: Net receipts to central Government from special sales of assets are shown in table 2.14 of the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428). The figures were £494 million in 1981-82; £488 million in 1982-83; and £1,142 million in 1983-84. The figures exclude the effect of advance oil payments from BNOC in 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 which net out to zero.

Manufacturing Trade Figures

50. Mr. Evans asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect on the economy of the latest manufacturing trade figures.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest trade figures for manufacturing, excluding the erratic items which tend to distort the figures, show an encouraging increase in export volumes, which rose by about 11 per cent. between 1983 and 1984, the best performance since 1973. The deficit on trade in manufactures last year was more than offset by surpluses on oil and invisibles. However, these figures are not the only indicators of the performance of the manufacturing sector. Manufacturing output rose 3¼ per cent. in 1984, and is now 9 per cent. higher than it was in the first half of 1981.

Share Option Scheme

52. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response there has been to the approved share option scheme in the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Moore: I am pleased to say that there has been an excellent response. By the end of January more than 960 share option schemes had been submitted to the Inland Revenue for approval under the provisions of the Finance Act 1984. Over 80 of these have already been approved and several hundred more are in the final stages of approval.

Direct and Indirect Taxation

53. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on how he sees the future relationship between direct and indirect taxation.

Mr. Moore: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

Gas and Electricity Industries

54. Mr. Ashton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied that the gas and electricity industries can meet the targets laid down for them in the recent public expenditure White Paper without increasing their prices above the rate of inflation.

Mr. Peter Rees: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on 30 January 1985 at column 221.

Pools Betting Duty

55. Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated yield in a full year from the extension of pools betting duty to newspaper prize competitions.

Mr. Hayhoe: Negligible—the application of any of the existing betting and gaming duties to newspaper prize competitions would be expected to result in changes in the nature of the games to avoid liability.

Economic Trends

57. Mr. Dykes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the latest trends in the real economy of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Rees: GDP on the output measure grew by 2½ per cent. in 1984. Business investment and non-oil export volumes both set new records.

Manufacturing Investment

60. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the level of manufacturing investment in the last year for which figures are available; and what is the comparable figure for five years ago.

Mr. Peter Rees: Investment in manufacturing, including leased assets, in 1984 rose 13 per cent. to an estimated £6·1 billion at 1980 prices. In the peak year of 1979 the figure was £8·2 billion.

Employment and Wages

62. Mr. Foster asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the Treasury document, "The Relationship between Employment and Wages".

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received a number of letters about this document.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will explain how real wages can fall if the demand for labour exceeds the supply, as discussed in paragraph 2.24 of his Department's paper on the relationship between wages and employment.

Mr. Peter Rees: Clearly real wages do not depend simply on the relationship between labour demand and supply or they would have been falling in recent years. Even if labour demand exceeds supply, real wages might still fall temporarily if, for example, there were an external shock to the price level.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent the model used in his Department's study of the relationship between employment and real wages assumes imperfect competition and increasing returns to scale.

Mr. Peter Rees: The labour demand functions which were contained in the model used in the Treasury's study of the relationship between wages and employment are consistent with constant returns to scale. The model as a whole assumes price setting behaviour which is consistent with the assumptions of imperfect competition.

Mr. O'Brien asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he intends to take in the light of the recent paper by Her Majesty's Treasury, "The Relationship between Employment and Wages."

Mr. Lawson: This paper demonstrated clearly that slower increases in real pay will lead to more jobs; a point which needs to be more widely understood. The Government are doing all in their power to make labour markets work better and help bring this about.

Investment

63. Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the level of investment in the United Kingdom

Mr. Peter Rees: In real terms total fixed investment is expected to have reached an all-time record in 1984, up 7½ per cent. on 1983. A further increase is expected in 1985.

Infrastructure

64. Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take to encourage investment in the economy's infrastructure; and if he will make a statement

Mr. Peter Rees: Total fixed investment in the economy in 1984 is expected to have been an all time record and is forecast to grow even further in 1985. These trends reflect the success of the Government's policy of shifting economic activity and ownership back into the private sector.

Capital Investment

66. Mr. William Powell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the level of capital investment in the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: There was a very substantial rise in the level of capital investment in the United Kingdom in 1984, including a 12¼ per cent. rise in manufacturing and services investment, and the prospects are for substantial further growth in 1985.

Banking (Advertising)

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make regulations under section 34 of the Banking Act 1979 to control advertisements for deposits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. Following the consultations which the Bank of England carried out with the Treasury's agreement last year, the Treasury is today laying regulations (SI 1985/220) which will contol advertisements issued in the United Kingdom for deposits to be made outside the United Kingdom or any other member state of the European Community.

The regulations will come into effect on 1 July 1985. The main provision of the regulations will require such advertisements to include a "health warning" stating where the deposit is to be made and drawing attention to the fact that the deposit is not protected by the deposit protection scheme under the Banking Act 1979. The Treasury will on the same day repeal by order the Protection of Depositers Act 1963 and the Protection of Depositors (Northern Ireland) Act 1964 and will bring section 39 of the Banking Act 1979—which deals with fraudulent inducement to make deposits—into effect.

Minimum Income Level

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the number of P11D forms concerning benefits in kind which would be submitted, (b) loss of revenue and (c) administrative cost arising in a full financial year, if the minimum income level was raised to £15,000 per annum.

Mr. Moore: The earnings threshold of £8,500 defining those in "higher-paid employment" for the purpose of assessing benefits in kind does not apply to most directors. If the threshold was raised to £15,000 for 1985-86, about 700,000 forms P11D would be submitted. The direct revenue cost in a full year would be about £125 million and the savings of administrative costs about £3 million.

Wage and Profit Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will abstract from his computer simulation on real wages and employment a table showing for each year the effect of the reduction in real wages on profits generally and by subdivision; if he will provide whatever information is available from the simulation concerning the use made of any increase in profitability generally and by subdivision, including, in particular, manufacturing investment and overseas investment; and if he will publish in the Official Report the assumptions used in obtaining these results, in non-algebraic terms.

Mr. Peter Rees: Information on profits and investment is shown in the following table. The assumptions, detailed in the footnotes, are the same as for the results shown in table A, Annex B of the recent paper by Treasury officials entitled "The Relationship between Employment and Wages.".

Simulated effects of lower nominal wages.†

Polling Stations (Portable Ramps)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those local authorities in Wales which have installed at polling stations portable ramps for the disabled, half the cost of which was met by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Peter Rees: No instance has been found in the records held by the Treasury of election claims from acting returning officers for the 1979 general and European elections and, in terms of the claims so far received, the 1983 general and the 1984 European elections, of any local authority in Wales installing at polling stations portable ramps for the disabled, for which half the cost has been met by Her Majesty's Government.

Similar information for elections prior to 1979 is not available.

Statistical Information

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish indices for each year since 1978-79, taking 1978-79 as 100, comparing (a) public expenditure, (b) retail prices index, (c) index of industrial production, (d) wages, salaries and income from self-employment, (e) expenditure on social security benefits, (f) revenue from income tax and (g) revenue from national insurance contributions.

Mr. Peter Rees: The indices are as follows:

		1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
(a)	Public expenditure	117	141	159	173	183
(b)	Retail Price Index	116	135	150	161	168
(c)	Index of Industrial Production	103	94	93	95	98
(d)	Wages, salaries and income from employment	118	135	145	155	167
(e)	Expenditure on social security benefits	118	142	175	198	208
(f)	Revenue from income tax	110	130	153	163	167
(g)	Revenue from national insurance contributions	116	139	156	181	203

Exchange Rate (Deutschmark)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report particulars of the increase in the real exchange rate against the deutschmark since March 1983, the balance of trade in manufactures with West Germany in 1984 compared with 1970, and his estimate of the effect of the increase in the real exchange rate on the balance in 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Between March 1983 and January 1985, the real sterling exchange rate against the deutschmark is estimated to have appreciated by 7½ per cent. This estimate is based on the movement in producer prices up to November 1984. The increase is wholly accounted for by the faster rise in producer prices in the United Kingdom than in Germany, since the nominal deutschmark/sterling exchange rate in January 1985 (£1=3·58 DM) was almost unchanged from its level in March 1983 (3·59).

The balance of trade in manufactures with West Germany in 1984 was −£5·1 billion of an Overseas Trade Statistics basis which includes the carriage, insurance and freight element of imports but not of exports. The comparable figure in 1970 was −£0·1 billion.

Wages (Employment Effects)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent his simulation of the effect of real wages on employment is based on extrapolations from the past; and who has decided the direction of causation in interpreting correlations.

Mr. Peter Rees: The model on which the simulation was performed contains relationships for the demand for labour which were estimated using data from the past. A summary of the econometric evidence, including that used in the Treasury model, is provided in the Treasury paper, "The relationship between employment and wages", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. The interpretation of the findings of the empirical research was the responsibility of Treasury officials.

Taxation Changes (Job Creation)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what research he has carried out or studied into the job creation effects of cuts in the income tax rates and raising of income tax thresholds.

Mr. Moore: Income tax cuts improve incentives and encourage lower wage settlements. Low tax countries like the United States and Japan have experienced relatively large increases in employment. Evidence on the relation between wages and employment is set out in the recent paper by Treasury officials.

Indirect Taxation

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made as to whether an increase in indirect taxation would have any disincentive effect.

Mr. Hayhoe: The effect of a change in indirect taxation on incentives is difficult to assess, but is one of the factors considered in any review of such taxation.

Income Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the total revenue obtained from income tax plus national insurance contributions together in each year since 1978-79 at current and at constant 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Moore: The figures are as follows:

£ million

	Current prices	*At 1978-79 prices
1978-79	27,957	27,957
1979-80	31,285	26,760
1980-81	37,052	26,730
1981-82	43,112	28,290
1982-83	47,138	29,000
1983-84	49,849	29,440

* Using the GDP deflator.

Pound Sterling

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the value of the pound sterling against the European currency unit each month since May 1979.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information required is as follows:

Value of European currency unit exchange rate (monthly averages) expressed in pound sterling

Private Health Insurance (Tax Allowance)

Mr. Gregory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much income tax yield was forgone as a result of private health insurance tax offset allowance in the 1982-83 and 1983-84 tax years; and if he will give an estimate for 1984-85;

(2) if he will estimate income tax yields in 1985-86 if the private health insurance tax allowance (a) remains at its present level, (b) is index-linked, (c) is increased by 50 per cent. and (d) is increased by 100 per cent.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

Fringe Benefits

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) male and (b) female employees are known to the Inland Revenue to be benefiting from their employer providing (i) a company car, (ii) an occupational health scheme, (iii) subsidised meals at work, (iv) financial help with school fees, telephone bills, wages of chauffeurs, gardeners and other domestic staff and (v) nursery facilities for their children; and what revenue is obtained by the Exchequer from taxing each of these benefits either wholly or partly.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Benefits (Taxation)

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of revenue raised from taxation of benefits paid to the unemployed in 1984.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Cash Flows)

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the monthly cash flows for each European Economic Community country, with the European Economic Community, for each of the last 48 months with annual sub-totals, cash flow being defined as a net result of all contributions and rebates in the month in which the transaction is affected.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I regret the information my hon. Friend requires is not available. However, certain details of the transactions between member states and the European Community are contained in the annual reports of the Court of Auditors. Copies of these are held in the Commons Library.

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out for each of the last 48 months with annual sub-totals the cash flow between the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community with regard to European Economic Community contributions broken down as follows: (a) value added tax contributions, (b) customs levies, (c) agricultural levies, (d) other costs, (e) rebate and (f) other returns, setting out in each case the period to which the rebate refers.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information my hon. Friend asks for is not readily available in the form he requires and could not be provided without disproportionate cost. However, figures concerning the United Kingdom's gross contributions, receipts and refunds, by financial year, for the period in question are contained in the latest public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428), which was published last January.

EC (Rebate)

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) at what stage under the Fontainebleau agreement it was anticipated that the United Kingdom would obtain its rebate by abatement of contribution;

(2) by what date he anticipates that the United Kingdom rebate will be obtained though abatement of contribution.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

Taxation Changes

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received to date advocating taxation changes in the forthcoming Budget.

Mr. Moore: Several.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about the effect value added tax on building alterations has had on house adaptations carried out for disabled people.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam).

Mortgage Interest Relief

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of revenue forgone in respect of mortgage interest tax relief on second or subsequent loans over and above those used for the first purchase of a house.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 11 February 1985, c. 61]: It is not possible to provide a precise figure, but it is estimated that between 5 and 10 per cent. of the £3,500 million total cost of relief for qualifying loans in 1984-85 is in respect of a second or subsequent loan over and above that used for the first purchase of the dwelling.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will estimate the proportion of capital spending by central and local government undertaken in the northern region.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 20 February 1985, c. 494]: The latest available estimates of gross domestic fixed capital formation by central and local government in the English regions were included in table 7 (page 93) of the appendix to the article "Regional Accounts, 1983" in the November 1984 issue of Economic Trends (No. 373). That table showed that total gross domestic fixed capital formation in the United Kingdom in 1982 was £4,682 million and in the northern region £268 million, representing 5·7 per cent. of the United Kingdom total.

These figures are net of sales of fixed assets, which include, in particular, sales of council houses by local authorities.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Strangers Gallery (Demonstrators)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Lord Privy Seal how many people were involved in the demonstration in the Strangers Gallery on Friday 15 February; how they obtained tickets; how long they were detained; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: On the morning of Friday 15 February four visitors caused a disturbance in the Strangers' Gallery; Admission Orders for these persons were obtained by a Member of Parliament. The persons concerned were detained until 3.55 pm, this being half an hour after the rising of the House.

SCOTLAND

Ministers (Overnight Stays)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many overnight stays he and each of his Ministers made in Scotland during the month of January.

Mr. Younger: The information is as follows:

	Number	(In addition) Sleeper journeys
Secretary of State	17	4
Lord Gray of Contin	11	—
Michael Ancram	17	—
Mr. John MacKay	16	—
Mr. Allan Stewart	15	2

Glenrothes (Regional Development Grant)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, in the light of the considerable job losses in the Kirkcaldy-Glenrothes travel-to-work area following the closure of the Frances colliery and the threat to employment prospects in the Seafield colliery, he will reconsider urgently the recent decision to exclude Glenrothes from regional development grant benefits.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Government's decisions on the assisted area map, which were announced on 28 November 1984, took account of a number of factors, including occupational and industrial structure, and the new map is expected to remain in force for some years. The loss of jobs at the Frances and Seafield pits, and the continuing threat to the remaining jobs, are a direct consequence of the miners' strike, and are further examples of the damage caused by this pointless and unnecessary dispute.

Housing Grants

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many grant applications were made in the last financial year in Cunninghame for (a) improvement grants, (b) repair grants and (c) insulation grants; and how many of these applications were approved.

Mr. Younger: Information on the number of grant applications made is not held centrally. Details of grant applications approved by Cunninghame district council during the financial year 1983-84 are as follows:

Grants for	Number
(a)
(i) Improvement of dwellings	343
(ii) Conversion of dwellings	4
(iii) Provision of standard amenities	12
(b) Repair of dwellings	1,229
(c) Home insulation	240

Legal Aid

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has concluded his review of the variations in refusals for granting legal aid in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: No.

Asbestos

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) district councils in Scotland which have received central Government funds for the purpose of asbestos removal programmes, (b) how much each council received and (c) which councils have (i) embarked upon and (ii) completed such programmes.

Mr. Ancram: Capital allocations to individual local authorities are not earmaked for specific purposes. No district councils have therefore received funds allocated for asbestos works per se. In a block allocation system each authority is free to programme the resources available to it, as it sees fit.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the Scottish local authorities which maintain a register showing the location and condition of asbestos-containing materials in buildings for which they are responsible.

Mr. Ancram: All district councils were asked in 1983 to bring their records of the use of asbestos in any part of their housing stocks up to date. I do not, however, hold information centrally.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the allowances made in the capital allocations to Scottish local authorities in the current year and next year for asbestos treatment work which he judges to be necessary.

Mr. Ancram: In determining the level of capital allocations to individual local authorities we have paid close attention to planned expenditure on asbestos treatment, as set out in their forward capital programmes, but have not earmarked fixed sums within the allocations for this purpose. Programming of the resources made available is left to authorities' own judgment.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his assessment of the necessary asbestos treatment work local authorities in Scotland should carry out in the current year and in each of the next three years.

Mr. Ancram: Local authorities are themselves best placed to examine their own building stocks and, with the help of guidance which has been issued by the Scottish Development Department, to assess the nature and phasing of any necessary asbestos treatment.

Acid Rain

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Forestry Commission will publish the results of its surveys into possible acid rain damage to trees; and what plans it has for further research.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission will publish the results of its survey on 12 March 1985. The survey will be repeated towards the end of this year.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies the Forestry Commission has made, is planning or is aware of, of mobilisation of aluminium by acid deposition, and its uptake into timber and deposition there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Both the Forestry Commission and the Department of the Environment commission research on aluminium mobilisation with the Macaulay Institute for Soil Research, Aberdeen. This work is linked closely with studies at the Norwegian Forest Research Institute and at Toronto university. The Forestry Commission is analysing the aluminium content of certain stands of Sitka spruce growing in the South Wales coalfield. It is also undertaking joint investigations with the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology into soil-water and aluminium mobilisation at Beddgelert, Gwynedd and at Hafren, Powys.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans the Forestry Commission has, or is aware of, to conduct new research into the problem of ash dieback in the next three financial years.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has no plans to undertake research into ash dieback. It will, however, take account of the results of a survey of the incidence of this phenomenon next summer which will follow up that conducted in 1983 by Dr. Pawsey of the Department of Forestry, Oxford.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his answer of 18 February, Official Report, columns 357-60, he will give a more precise indication of the area and time of year involved in the aerial spraying of Fenitrothion on 142 hectares of land in Speymouth in 1984 by the Forestry Commission.

Mr. John MacKay: The 142 hectares sprayed with Fenitrothion in 1984 form part of the Elchies block of Craigellachie forest in the Speyside forest district and were treated on 30 May. The reference to "Speymouth" in my answer of 18 February should have read "Speyside".

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the initial findings following the aerial spraying of Fenitrothion on 142 hectares of land in Speymouth by the Forestry Commission in 1984 as part of a control experiment.

Mr. John MacKay: No effects were found on the bird populations studied which could be ascribed to the spraying.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations were held with conservation bodies prior to the aerial spraying of Fenitrothion over 142 hectares of land in Speymouth by the Forestry Commission in 1984 as part of a control experiment directed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. John MacKay: The bodies consulted included the Nature Conservancy Council and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if research was conducted into the existence of wildlife habitats, other than those of woodland birds, in the area aerially sprayed with Fenitrothion by the Forestry Commission in 1984 as part of a control experiment directed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, prior to the experiment taking place.

Mr. John MacKay: This experiment concentrated solely on certain species of bird.

Tourist-related Projects

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what tourist-related projects are currently planned in Scotland by the Forestry Commission, the British Waterways Board, the National Heritage Memorial Fund, the Scottish Sports Council and the Scottish Arts Council.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 206]: Tourist-related projects currently planned in Scotland by the Forestry Commission, the British Waterways Board, the National Heritage Memorial Fund, and the Scottish Sports Council are as follows:

The Forestry Commission

Car park at Rowardennan, Central region; car park at Cairnbaan, Strathclyde region; forest trail at Silverbridge, Highland region; camp site toilets at Balmacara, Highland region.

The British Waterways Board

(i) Caledonian Canal: improvements to facitilies for boaters at Banavie; improvements to mooring facilities at various points including provision of pontoon jetties; provision of information signs for motorists; improvements to departure quay and provision of signposting for visitors for the Scot II boat trip.

(ii) Crinan Canal: improvements to mooring facilities at Ardrishaig Basin; landscaping at Bellanoch Bay.

(iii) Forth and Clyde Canal: improvements at Bowling Basin including provision of a sanitary station; provision of information signs for motorists.

(iv) Union Canal: dredging of canal between Ratho and Hermiston to increase length of canal available to the "Pride of the Union" restaurant boat.

The board also proposes to promote an economic development study which will identify tourist-related development opportunities within the Forth and Clyde and Union Canal corridors.

The National Heritage Memorial Fund

Assistance is planned towards: restoration of cottages on islands of Canna, Highland Region and Sanday, Orkney; purchase by Hamilton district council of Chatelherault Deer Park, Strathclyde region; purchase and endowment by National Trust for Scotland of Fyvie castle, Grampian region; purchase, endowment and restoration by National Trust for Scotland of Hillhouse, Helensburgh, Strathclyde region; restoration of the North Pavilion of Hopetoun House, Lothian region; restoration of New Lanark Mills, Strathclyde region; purchase by National galleries of Scotland of four paintings from the Sutherland collection.

The Scottish Sports Council

Grandtully Canoeing Centre, Tayside region; Manor Pawis Shooting Centre, Central region; Kippen Clay Pigeon Shooting Centre, Central region.

The Scottish Arts Council undertakes few projects itself but gives assistance by way of grants and guarantees to arts organisations and individuals working within the arts field, many of whom have a strong influence on the attraction of tourists to Scotland.

Local Authority Finance (Tourism)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those district authorities in Scotland which have to date refused or delayed to commit their share of local authority finance to each of the area tourist boards for the forthcoming financial year.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 206]: I am not aware that any district authorities have done so.

Small Firms

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many small firms were given assistance by the Scottish Economic Planning Department and others of his Department in the course of the last 12 months to the latest convenient date; and how much money was involved;

(2) how many small firms in Scotland, falling within the Bolton committee definition, received regional development grants and other forms of financial assistance from this Department; and how much money was involved.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 13 February 1985, c. 211]: During 1984 133 offers of selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 were accepted by small firms in Scotland. The total value of these offers was £11·9 million. I regret that information in the form requested is not readily available for other forms of assistance administered by my Department.

EC (Aid)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total amount of European Community aid received by (a) Strathclyde regional council, (b) Glasgow district council and (c) private organisations in Glasgow, up to the most recently available date.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 243]: The available information is as follows:

European Regional Development Fund

From the inception of the ERDF in 1975 Strathclyde regional council has received grants totalling £64·2 million for a range of infrastructure projects. The corresponding figure for Glasgow district council is £3·3 million. Over the same period, small firms in Strathclyde have received £1·8 million from the ERDF for measures to assist their development. Separate figures for small firms in Glasgow are not available.

European Coal and Steel Community

ECSC industrial loans in Strathclyde currently total some £21·5 million. A separate figure for Glasgow is not available.

European Investment Bank

Since 1975 the EIB has granted loans totalling £104·2 million to Strathclyde regional council to finance infrastructure projects. Over the same period, loans totalling £31·6 million have been granted to private sector organisations in Strathclyde. No separate figure is available for private organisations in Glasgow.

European Social Fund

In 1983 and 1984 Strathclyde regional council received grants totalling £6·5 million from the ESF in respect of training and employment schemes in its area. No awards were made in the same period to Glasgow district council.

In 1983 private sector organisations in Strathclyde received ESF grants totalling £2·0 million. No equivalent figure is yet available for 1984. Separate figures are not available for private organisations in Glasgow.

Local authorities and private organisations in Strathclyde also benefit from ESF support for schemes of the Manpower Services Commission. It is not possible, however, to provide a breakdown of the figures for individual areas.

European Agriculture Guidance and Guarantee Fund (FEOGA)

Under the guidance section of the fund (EC regulation 355/77) grants totalling £0·26 million have been made since 1977 to private sector organisations in Glasgow. No similar grants have been made in the same period to either of the local authorities.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to make arrangements with the European Economic Community to allow full interchangeability between direct sellers of milk and holders of wholesale quotas.

Mr. Jopling: As a result of our repeated pressure the Commission has now made proposals designed to provide greater flexibility between wholesale and direct sale quotas. I shall be pressing for the urgent adoption of the necessary measures.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the cost in 1983 and 1984 of the reduced rate of co-responsibility levy on milk production in the less favoured areas of the United Kingdom, excluding hill farms; and how this compares with earlier years;

(2) what was the cost to the European Economic Community budget in 1983 and 1984 of exempting hill farms in the United Kingdom from the co-responsibility levy on milk production; and how this compares with earlier years.

Mr. MacGregor: Co-responsibility levy is collected on milk delivered to dairies, but at a rate reduced by 0·5 per cent. in respect of producers in less favoured areas as defined in article 3(4) of directive 75/268/EEC, up to an annual limit of 60,000 kilograms per producer. Hill farms in the United Kingdom are not exempted from the co-responsibility levy on milk production. They fall within the less favoured areas and benefit from the lower rate of levy. The levy collected from them is not separately identified. If the levy had been collected at the full rate in the less favoured areas in the calendar years of 1983 and 1984 it is estimated that the following additional amounts would have been payable to the European Community budget.

1984	668,905

In years prior to 1983 the amounts would have been similar to those in 1983. In 1984 the scope of the designation of less favoured areas was extended and so the benefit from the reduced rate increased.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department is carrying out or is aware of, apart from the Boxworth experiment, into the effects of pesticides on (a) moths and butterflies, (b) flowering plants, (c) birds and (d) beneficial insects that may be exposed to pesticides in hedgerows or other habitats contaminated by spray or vapour drift.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the next 10 pesticides which are to be subject to a full review of safety and or efficacy by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides.

Mr. MacGregor: It is not possible to anticipate decisions of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides. However, the committee carried out reviews in 1984 on the uses of aminotriazole, chlorbromuron, ethylene dibromide, and ethylene dichloride.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to which insecticide products or active ingredients in use (a) in food or crops storage, (b) on main crops and (c) in horticulture, increased pest resistance has developed since their clearance under the PSPS.

Mr. MacGregor: Pest resistance has developed to the following pesticide active ingredients, still in use:

(a) food storage practice — bendiocarb, biorespethrin, bromophos, chlordane, chloropyriphos-methyl, deltamethrin, diazinon, dichlorvos, dieldrin, dimethoate, etrimfos, fenchlorphos, fenitrothion, HCH, lodofenphos, malathion, methacrifos, methyl bromide, permethrin, pimimiphos methyl, propoxur, pyrethrins, resmethrin, tetramethrin, trichlorphon;

(b) in agriculture and horticulture — aldicarb, aldrin, binapacryl, chlorbenside, chlorfenson, cypermethrin, dicofol, fenson, HCH, permethrin, pirimicarb, tetradifon; and a range of organophosphorous active ingredients.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what pest or disease would normally be controlled through the spraying of the pesticide fenitrothion.

Mr. MacGregor: Under the agricultural chemicals approval scheme fenitrothion is approved for the control of the following pests in agriculture, horticulture, and food storage:

aphids, apple blossom weevil, apple sawfly, capsids, codling, tortrix and winter moths and suckers (apple and pear), aphids and caterpillars (plum), capsids and sawflies (blackcurrant and gooseberry), raspberry beetle, raspberry cane midge, strawberry tortrix aphids, midge, moths, thrips and weevils (pea), frit fly (maize and sweet corn), saddle gall midge, wheat blossom midge and thrips in cereals and (by making a bran bait), leatherjackets in cereals. Also treatment of the farm grain stores to control saw-toothed grain beetle, grain weevil, rust-red grain beetle and rust-red flour beetle.

Forestry pests that may be controlled by fenitrothion are pine beauty moth and winter moth under the pesticides safety precautions scheme.

It is also cleared for use in animal husbandry and in and around the home and garden.

Farming Techniques

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers, by county, are using (a) organic methods and (b) low-input, low-output methods.

Mr. Jopling: I regret that such information is not available.

Cereals (Fungal Diseases)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fungal diseases of cereals were known to include economically significant resistant strains in relation to use of one or more fungicides in (a) 1965, (b) 1970, (c) 1975, (d) 1980 and (e) 1984; and if he will name them.

Mr. MacGregor: Currently, only eyespot is known to include economically significant resistant strains to the fungicides benomyl, carbendazim and thiophanatemethyl, but alternative chemicals are available. Detailed information on the position in past years is not readily available. However, where resistance has occurred in the past it has been overcome by the use of alternative fungicides and the development of new ones.

Herbicides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to which herbicide products or active ingredients, cleared under the PSPS at any time, there are now more common resistant strains of weed than at the time of their introduction.

Mr. MacGregor: There are two herbicides which fall into this category—Atrazine and simazine. Alternatives exist for both.

Animal Feedingstuffs

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each dairy product the estimated amount sold in 1984 from intervention stocks, or otherwise financed by European Economic Community funds, for use as an animal feedingstuff; and if he will provide similar figures for 1983, 1979 and 1970 together with the cost to European Economic Community funds.

Mr. MacGregor: Skimmed milk powder and liquid skimmed milk are made available under Community schemes for use in animal feedingstuffs. The quantities for which applications for aid were made in 1973 (the first year for which data are readily available), 1979 and 1983 were as follows:

'000 tonnes

	Liquid skimmed milk	Skimmed milk powder
1973	4,855	1,200
1979	4,419	1,812
1983	4,924	1,809

Total expenditure on these measures during the respective calendar years was £145 million, £715 million and £1,100 million.

Data are not yet available for 1984.

EC (Agricultural Exports)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing estimated European Economic Community exports of common agricultural policy products by volume in 1984 compared with 1983, 1979 and 1972 together with the corresponding imports.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest information on the annual volume of European Community trade in agricultural products is summarised in "The Agricultural Situation in the European Community—1984 Report", published by the Commission. A copy of this report is available in the Library of the House.

Corresponding information for the earlier years is contained in the reports for 1981 and 1975.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the agricultural products regulated under the common agricultural policy the amount of levy payable in the United Kingdom on importation from third countries, the amount of customs duty, the intervention or threshold price, the target price and the United Kingdom market price and the world price.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Sheepmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the total amount collected, and the average per pound of meat, in respect of the export charge on sheepmeat in each year since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Agricultural Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing changes since 1972 in the relationship between the unit of account used for agricultural purposes and the market rate of the European currency unit and the changes in the relationship of (i) sterling and (ii) the deutschmark to the agricultural unit of account, together with an explanation as to what the effect would be on agricultural prices in the United Kingdom in terms of sterling of (iii) a fall in the value of the pound against the market rate for the European currency unit and (iv) of an increase in the value of the deutschmark against the market value of the European currency unit.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested on the past relationship between the European currency unit—which would need to be valued in terms of the market rates for its constituent currencies — and the relevant agricultural accounting unit at the time—which varies during the period quoted—is not readily available, and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. A Commission document is available giving the value of certain currencies, including sterling and the deutschmark, against the unit of account—or since 9 April 1979 the European currency unit — between March 1973 and December 1981. I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House. Information for 1972 is not readily available. As I explained to the hon. Member on 17 December 1984 and 31 January 1985, changes in the value of the deutschmark or of sterling have no effect on CAP support prices in the United Kingdom.

Agricultural Production (Costs)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each European Economic Community country the amount spent under the national budget on agricultural production in addition to the amounts received from the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: The national budgets of the Community member states are drawn up on very differing bases, so that comparable figures for expenditure on national support for agriculture are not readily available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report the total spent in the United Kingdom under the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund guidance section of the European Economic Community budget in 1983 and in 1984; and if he will give particulars of the amounts spent on (a) limiting production and (b) increasing production;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each member state the amount spent under the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund guarantee section in 1983 compared with 1972 and 1979 together with the estimate for 1984; and if he will break the total down (a) by product and (b) by export refunds, storage aids, and so on;

(3) what is the estimated expenditure for each of the principal products under the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund guarantee scheme in 1984 compared with the amount appropriated; and if he will provide corresponding figures for expenditure in 1972, 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration has been given to increasing the attendance allowance for patients on home dialysis to ensure that it covers the real cost of employing a nurse attendant.

Mr. Newton: A related proposal, that home dialysis patients should receive automatically the higher rate of attendance allowance, was put to us last year by Mrs. Elizabeth Ward of the Bristol Kidney Patients Association, and I met her to discuss it in November. I made the point that, uniquely, home dialysis at least twice weekly is already deemed to entail entitlement to the lower rate of attendance allowance, and that we did not believe that the case for going further had been made out, especially since improved dialysis techniques have tended to reduce rather than increase the amount of time during which attendance is required.

The two rates of attendance allowance are intended to reflect a broad measure of appropriate help for those needing constant attention by day or by night, or both. They do not represent a specific item or items of expenditure; and, with over 450,000 allowances in payment, it would be impracticable to attempt to set individual rates according to individual circumstances.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the age range and what were the lengths of stay of all the men and women in each of his Department's 23 resettlement units on the night of 31 December 1984 and on each 31 December since 1979 inclusive.

Mr. Whitney: As the tables giving these details are lengthy, I am writing to my hon. Friend and placing a copy in the Library.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether there is any evidence from limited list schemes elsewhere that delays in diagnosis may occur as a result, with the consequent prescribing of more expensive remedies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The only report we have seen on this issue concerns the West German diagnosis-related limited list. Our limited list proposals will ensure that a fully effective range of drugs is available for all conditions at National Health Service expense, and so there will be no reason for delays in diagnosis.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has on the efficiency of the monitoring system which exists in Germany to oversee the medical impact of the limited list scheme;

(2) what assessment he has made of the cost savings achieved by the German scheme for a limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We studied the limited list schemes in a number of countries, including Germany, before drawing up our own rather different limited list proposals. We have made no assessment of savings from overseas schemes. That is a matter for the Governments concerned.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which royal colleges have indicated support for the Government's limited list drug proposals; and how that support has been indicated.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In a letter to The Times of 15 January 1985 the president of the Royal College of Physicians, Professor Sir Raymond Hoffenberg, indicated that three royal colleges support the principle underlying the Government's proposals. These were his own college and two others.

General Practitioners (Over-prescribing)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's policy regarding arraignment of general practitioners before medical service committees for over-prescribing of National Health Service drugs; and how many such cases there were in the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No provision exists for general practitioners to appear before medical service committees for over-prescribing. Regulation 16 of the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunal) Regulations 1974 provide for such cases to be considered by the local medical committee. No cases have been dealt with under this procedure during the last three years in England.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors have been referred to their local medical committees for excessive prescribing under paragraph 16 of the Service Committee and Tribunal Regulations 1974 in each of the last three years; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Prescribers whose costs are above average are visited by our regional medical officers who also discuss prescribing topics in the course of their regular contacts with general practitioners. The use of powers contained in paragraph 16 of the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunals) Regulations 1974 has been regarded as a last resort and there have been no such cases in the last three years in England.

National Staff Committee for Nurses and Midwives

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce his decision on the future of the National Staff Committee for Nurses and Midwives; if he is satisfied that the consultation period has been long enough to enable the profession to submit its views; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The National Staff Committee for Nurses and Midwives is now funded by the National Health Service Training Authority, which is consulting about review of committee structure. We have had no representations about the authority's consultation period. We expect to receive the authority's recommendations in the spring, after which we shall make our decision.

Sex Education

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his consultations with the Department of Education and Science about more counselling and health education for young people will cover the need for appropriate sex education programmes in all maintained schools.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. We see sex education for young people as important in tackling such problems as those identified in the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists research on late abortions. The provision of sex education in schools is a matter for local education authorities and individual schools.

Hospital Services (East Anglia)

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on the present and future funding of hospital services in East Anglia;

(2) what account he takes in allocating funding for hospital services in East Anglia, of the current level of spending per capita relative to that in other regions; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what account he takes, in allocating funds for hospital services in East Anglia, of the current and projected rates of population growth in the region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This Government remain committed to achieving a fair distribution of resources across the country, using the approach recommended by the resource allocation working party (RAWP). On this basis, the East Anglian region can expect, under this Government to continue to receive increases in its revenue allocation which will be above the average increase for the country as a whole. In 1985-86 the region will receive a cash increase of 6·3 per cent. compared with 5·5 per cent. nationally, and the resource assumptions issued in January provide for growth of 1·9 per cent. and 2 per cent. for 1986-87 and 1987-88 compared with national growth in each of these years of 1 per cent. above forecast inflation.

These allocations take account of the fact that the region is currently funded at below national average levels and of the projected increase in the population in the East Anglian region.

NHS (Administrators)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make provision for the appointment of senior professionally-qualified directors of personnel and industrial relations at district and regional level in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect health authorities in reviewing their management arrangements to have regard to the views of the management inquiry on the need to strengthen the personnel function at all levels in the service and for improved training of line managers in personnel matters. Responsibility for developing and improving the effectiveness of the personnel function will be one of the primary tasks of the personnel director whose appointment as a member of the National Health Service management board will shortly be confirmed.

Pharmaceutical Companies (Return on Investment)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the proposed reduction by the Department of Health and Social Security of the return on investment guideline from Smith Kline French and other pharmaceutical companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received from Smith Kline and French and from some other companies representations that the revised profit targets under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme from 1 April are too low. However, we decided upon these targets after careful consideration of the 1984 report of the review board for Government contracts and of our need to achieve economies in the National Health Service drugs bill, and they must stand for the financial year 1985-86.

AIDS

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on 12 February, Official Report, column 155, and in the light of the expert medical views that lesbians carry the least risk of infection from the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus, if he will immediately develop a programme to encourage lesbians to give blood with a view to it being used for the production of heat-treated factor VIII.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We actively encourage everyone who is not in a group at high risk from AIDS to donate blood.

Inequalities in Health

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the present cost of implementing recommendations 10, 12, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29 of the working group report on inequalities in health.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The cost of implementing those recommendations, though undoubtedly very large, would depend to a considerable extent on the way they were implemented. In that light, and taking into account also the current review of social security benefits, estimates of cost would not be meaningful.

NHS (Administrative Costs)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the amount of money he expects to receive from National Health Service trust funds to pay for administrative costs during 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for each of the last five years, how much the Department has spent on maintaining electric-powered wheelchairs for (a) indoor use and (b) outdoor use; and what is the average cost for each type of electric-powered wheelchair;

(2) for each of the last five years, how many people have been issued with electric-powered indoor wheelchairs; how many of these have also been issued with an outdoor attendant-controlled electric wheelchair; and what is the cost of supplying indoor electric-powered wheelchairs;

(3) for each of the last five years (a) how much has been spent on the wheelchair services, (b) how many attendant-controlled electric powered wheelchairs have been (i) issued and (ii) bought as new by his Department and (c) what is the cost of providing attendant-controlled electric wheelchairs;

(4) for each of the last five years, how many people have applied for (a) an indoor electric-powered wheelchair and (b) an outdoor electric-powered wheelchair and had their application refused in each case;

(5) how many representations he has received on the need to provide occupant-controlled electric-powered wheelchairs that have either indoor and outdoor use or outdoor use only.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Child Benefit

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it remains his policy that child benefit will be uprated in November 1985 based on price rises in the 12 months up to 6 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: A decision about the rate of child benefit will be taken at the usual time later this year.

Hexafluorosilic Acid

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if hexafluorosilic acid has ever been submitted to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1985, c. 446]: No.

Aluminium

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what monitoring his Department carries out, or is aware of, of aluminium levels in water supplies and the diet; and if these relate to acid deposition.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have been asked to reply.

Statutory water undertakers carry out periodic monitoring of aluminium concentrations which are naturally present in their water supplies. More frequent monitoring is carried out when aluminium is used as part of the treatment process. The concentration in nearly all supplies in England is well within the limit laid down in the EC directive on the quality of water intended for human consumption. Aluminium concentrations in the raw water are related to the nature of the catchment area, including the acidity of the soil water, which mainly depends on the geology — though other factors, including acid deposition, also affect it. Responsibility for questions relating to diet lies with my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Organophosphorous Warblecides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies his Department has made, is planning or is aware of, concerning the health effects among livestock farmers, of using organophosphorous warblecides.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

Organophosphorous warblecides, like all veterinary medicines, are subject to the licensing requirements of the Medicines Act 1968. Each individual product must be the subject of a separate application and a licence is issued only after MAFF as licensing authority is satisfied as to the safety, quality and efficacy of the product concerned, including the safety of persons handling and administering the medicine. The licensing authority is advised by the Veterinary Products Committee, a statutory body of independent experts in human and animal health. Labels and literature for organophosphorous warblecides are required to carry instructions to operators concerning the use of the products.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he gives to county councils as to the scale of their monitoring of pesticide residues in food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

County councils, as food and drugs authorities, have responsibility for the enforcement of those provisions of the Food Act 1984 relating to the composition of food, including pesticide residues. They determine their own programmes of work. My Department's working party on pesticide residues publishes results of its national surveys, which are available to food and drugs authorities.

NHS (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give for each district in 1983-84 the total expenditure on cleaning, the expenditure on services provided by private cleaning companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former, and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in the previous year;

(2) if he will give for each district in 1983-84 the total expenditure on catering, the expenditure on services provided by private catering companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former, and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in 1982-83;

(3) if he will give for each district in 1983-84 the total expenditure on laundry, the expenditure on services provided by private laundry companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in 1982-83.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 330]: Following is the information requested, derived from the annual accounts of regional and district health authorities.

Figures for 1983-84 are not strictly comparable with those for 1982-83 as value added tax on contracted-out services became reclaimable by health authorities on 1 September 1983 and should have been excluded in recording expenditure incurred after that date.

WALES

Heart Beat Wales

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report his Department's grant to Heart Beat Wales for the next five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1984-85 the Welsh Office has made £20,000 available for Heart Beat Wales. I am announcing today that, subject to parliamentary approval, £100,000 will be made available to the programme in 1985-86. Our Department's support in future years will be considered annually in the light of the availability of resources and the programme's development.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the seven experts who form the panel on whom he is dependent for advice in relation to the limitation of the range of drugs available on the National Health Service in Wales either live or work in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None, but the Welsh Office chief medical officer was actively engaged in the deliberations of this expert group, which was made aware of the representations received by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the anticipated annual savings which he expects will arise in Wales from the intention to introduce a limited list of available drugs on the National Health Service.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In the light of the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services yesterday at columns 1223-24, it is now estimated that savings arising in Wales will be of the order of £4 million per annum rising over the next two or three years to about £5 million per annum.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions (General Belgrano)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will ask the Procedure Committee to consider the implications of the information made available by the Government relating to the sinking of the General Belgrano for the rules relating to parliamentary questions about advice given by officials to Ministers.

Mr. Biffen: Any matter relating to the rules for parliamentary questions is already within the terms of reference of the Procedure Committee.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospital Eye Service

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes he proposes to make relating to the hospital eye service when changes to general ophthalmic services take effect on 1 April.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The present arrangements for refraction and dispensing for hospital eye service patients will continue although they will be able to choose whether to have their prescriptions dispensed outside the National Health Service.

NHS (Current Cost Accounting)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to introduce current cost accounting in the Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to do so at present. The standard accounting practices now followed in the National Health Service were drawn up in 1982 by a working group of the Association of Health Service Treasurers. The standards proposed by the working group were based on the statement of standard accounting practice issued by the professional accountancy bodies, so far as they were judged to be relevant and practicable. In commenting on SSAP 16, which is the standard for current cost accounting, the working group stated in its report that "The NHS records capital expenditure separately, but does not record depreciation in revenue accounts. Accordingly this standard has no application to the accounts of the NHS."

Before the case for current cost accounting can be considered again it will be necessary to have established a method of accounting for the use of capital in the NHS. The case for this is now being considered by a working part of the AHST on which our Department and the Treasury are also represented. I understand that the Association expects to send the working party's report fairly soon to my right hon. Friend, and we shall then be considering its proposals.

North-East Thames RHA

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many members of the North-East Thames regional health authority (a) currently live in Waltham Forest and (b) have lived in Waltham Forest since the inception of the authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We do not hold home as opposed to work addresses for every member of North-East Thames regional health authority. Of those for whom we do hold home addresses none lives in Waltham Forest.

Nurse Practitioners

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurse practitioners are currently operating in Britain; under whose authority and on what conditions they operate; which of these nurse practitioners are allowed to dispense drugs under the general supervision of a general practitioner; and what information he has as to the nature and effectiveness of the service they provide.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Nurse practitioner is not recognised as a definition of a professional group in the National Health Service. As a matter of law, "prescription-only" medicine must be supplied in accordance with the prescription of a doctor. A nurse may not, therefore, dispense such drugs on her own initiative even under the general supervision of a general medical practitioner. This legislation has been enacted by Parliament as a protection for the consumers of medicines and drugs.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of unsettled homeless people who are not registered with general practitioners and the cities in which they are concentrated; what information he has of any difficulties they face in getting health treatment and the nature of these difficulties; and if he has any proposals, including greater use of nurse practitioners, to improve their access to National Health Service provision.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information about the numbers of unsettled homeless people who are not registered with general practitioners is not available.

The Government sponsored report "Single and Homeless" (HMSO 1981) provides an indication of the nature of problems encountered by homeless people in gaining access to primary health care. I announced in June 1984 that the Government were allocating a further £2 million over the next two years to help primary health care in the inner cities, £1·2 million in 1984 and £0·9 million this year. This is part of the £9 million announced in 1983 following the publication of the Acheson report to improve inner cities health services.

As I explained in my other reply to the right hon. Member today, nurse practitioner is not recognised as a definition of a professional group in the National Health Service. The care of such patients is for general medical practitioners as part of their services to the wider public.

Drug Dependence

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive advice from the medical working group on drug dependence on the extension of licensing restrictions to all opioids.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that the Medical Working Group intends to submit its advice on licensing shortly.

AIDS

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what facilities exist in Coventry, the west midlands and nationally for the screening of acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to increase the availability of screening facilities.

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make it compulsory for blood donors to be tested for acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Tests to detect the presence in blood of antibodies to the HTLV III virus have been developed both here and abroad. At present they are available only for research purposes. We hope that tests will be released for general use later this year. We shall thoroughly evaluate the tests on offer to see which is most suitable for use in the National Health Service. In anticipation of these developments we have advised regional health authorities to set aside funds in 1985-86 to enable blood transfusion centres to test all blood donations as soon as this is possible.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 1 February, Official Report, column 387, concerning the number of seasonal workers disallowed unemployment benefit between 1978 and 1983, if he will now provide an analysis of (a) the total disallowances and (b) the seasonal workers disallowances, broken down by standard regions.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the table. The regions are administrative regions of Department of Employment, who operate the unemployment benefit system as agents for this Department.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the recommendations of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council on the prescription of vibration white finger, bi-lateral diffuse pleural thickening and lung cancer will be implemented.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to announce that regulations were laid today which will add these diseases to the schedule of prescribed industrial diseases from 1 April 1985. Benefit will be payable to those in certain specified occupations who suffer from the more severe forms of vibration white finger and to asbestos workers suffering from bilateral diffuse pleural thickening or from lung cancer accompanied by asbestosis or bilateral diffuse pleural thickening.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Antarctica

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of the projects covered by the expanded research effort in Antarctica undertaken by the Natural Environment Research Council.

Sir Keith Joseph: The expanded research effort by the British Antacrtic Survey, an institute of the Natural Environment Research Council, covers work mainly in two areas: the geological and marine life sciences. In the former, the additional work includes fundamental research into geological processes and geological and geophysical surveys. In the latter there will be increased effort on studies of the marine ecosystem, including research into birds, seals, krill and fish.

Investigations by the BAS of the Antarctic ice environment as a measure of changes in climate, atmospheric pollution and sea level are also being enhanced.

Increased support by the NERC for university-based Antarctic research includes a three-year programme of research grants and studentships in the geological, life and atmospheric sciences and a five-year research contract with the University of Birmingham supporting marine geophysics.

Ethnic Minority Groups

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what steps he intends to take to assess academic progress and attainments in secondary schools in respect of pupils from Asian communities in comparison to those from West Indian communities;

(2) what resources he intends to make available for the purpose of promoting teacher exchanges between all-white and multiracial schools;

(3) what resources he intends to offer to ethnic minority community schools to assist them to raise their standards of education in conjunction with requirements set down in General Certificate of Education ordinary and advanced level syllabuses.

Mr. Dunn: These subjects are among those which have been reviewed by the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups, now chaired by Lord Swann. The Government will consider future action in the light of its findings.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he has taken resulting from the findings of the 1981 report on West Indian education chaired by Mr. Anthony Rampton.

Mr. Dunn: The interim findings of the committee of the inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups on children of West Indian origin were widely disseminated through a public consultation process initiated by the Government. Many LEAs and schools have taken action in response. For their part, the Government's policies on education have taken account of the needs brought about by ethnic diversity. The Government have undertaken a review of section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966, which resulted in 1982 in the promulgation of new criteria for the funding of posts. They have also set up a working group to look at the mechanics and acceptability of collecting ethnically based statistics on school pupils. The Government will consider further action in the light of the committee's final report.

Teachers (Pay)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of secondary school teachers have gained promotion to higher pay grades during the last five annual school years.

Mr. Dunn: Information is readily available only for the years ending in March 1980 to 1983 and is given below.

Percentage of teachers in service on 31 March who had been promoted since 31 March of previous year*

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Official Secrets Act

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Attorney-General, on what basis he decides who to consult before initiating prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: As in the case of a prosecution for any offence, before I authorise a prosecution under the Official Secrets Acts I consult any person who I consider is likely to be able to inform me of considerations which I might wish to take into account in deciding whether a prosecution would be in the public interest. If I have no reason to think that there are any such considerations, I do not consult anybody except for my hon. Friend the Solicitor-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Ponting Trial

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Attorney-General whether he was consulted by the Director of Public Prosecutions and the prosecution about the judge's indication on Wednesday 6 February that he intended to give an instruction to convict to the jury in the Ponting case.

The Attorney-General: No.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General how many cases of legal proceedings have been instituted resulting from assaults on striking miners since the commencement of the coal strike.

The Attorney-General: This information is not centrally recorded and could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of Her Majesty's Government's aid to Ethiopia in the last 12 months was redirected from other programmes.

Mr. Renton: None. Our aid to Ethiopia of around £29 million during the last 12 months has come from allocations already agreed for food aid, disaster relief of other specific purposes, from a reserve set aside for contingencies and from unavoidable slippage elsewhere in the aid programme. The Ministry of Defence has provided a substantial contribution by sending a Hercules detachment to assist in the distribution of relief supplies and this has naturally had some effect on its other flying activities.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Immigration (Waiting Times)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long is the waiting time for first interview in (a) the main queue and (b) the priority queue in Dhaka, Bombay, New Dehli and Islamabad.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is published quarterly in the Home Office bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics". As shown in this bulletin, at the end of third quarter of last year, waiting time to first interview for applicants in the non-priority queue in Dhaka was 22 months; in Bombay, 6 months; in New Dehli, 10½ months; and in Islamabad, 10½ months. Applicants placed in priority queues were interviewed in six months or less in Bangladesh and in two months in India and Pakistan.

World Disarmament Campaign

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funds his Department has given to the world disarmament campaign; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strong) on 28 November 1984 at column 68.

Nuclear Technology

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries, not being signatories of the non-proliferation treaty, have received nuclear technology from the United Kingdom since 1980.

Mr. Luce: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the transfer of nuclear equipment of facilities. If that is the case, no NPT non-party has received such technology from the United Kingdom since 1980.

Non-proliferation Treaty Review Conference

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take to seek to ensure that the 1980 breakdown on the non-proliferation treaty review conference does not recur at the 1985 review conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Although the 1980 review conference did not agree a substantive final document endorsing the treaty, there was broad agreement between the parties on the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, and no delegation contested the indispensable role played by the non-proliferation treaty in maintaining global security. Since 1980, the treaty has remained intact. No state party has withdrawn, and there have been eight new parties. Our policy towards the 1985 NPT review conference will reflect our very firm commitment to the treaty. We shall be working with other supporters of the NPT to achieve a satisfactory outcome which strengthens the Treaty in the long term.

GCHQ (Staff)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of the 83 staff in scientific and technical grades who resigned in 1984 from the Government communications headquarters for reasons other than retirement, transfer to another department, maternity or marriage, had already taken the £1,000 offered by the Government on relinquishing the right to join a trades union.

Mr. Rifkind: Of the 83 staff in the scientific and technical grades who resigned in 1984, 72 received the £1,000 in recognition of the loss of their statutory rights under the Employment Protection Acts of 1975.

"Government Spending"

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures will be taken by his Department following the conclusions of the report, "Government Spending."

Mr. Renton: The FCO is currently considering what action it will take to implement the recommendations of the report on Government purchasing as Departments have been asked to prepare action documents by 1 April. We have, however, already identified some areas where we can achieve greater value for money. These include improved arrangements for travel, freighting of officers' personal effects and obtaining supplies through central agencies.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the consequences for the United Kingdom of the failure of the European Assembly to approve a budget for the Community for 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: In the absence of an approved Community budget for 1985, Community spending, including spending in the United Kingdom is governed by the provisional twelfths regime. This limits payments to the level provided for in the relevant chapter of the 1984 budget, released on a month-by-month basis.

THE ARTS

Manchester Opera Festival

Mr. Arnold asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts when the Arts Council expects to consider the request it has received for financial support for the proposed Manchester opera festival in 1986.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Arts Council is considering what it can do to support the festival, but can make no formal allocation of funds until its own grant has been voted to them by Parliament.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Unemployment Costs

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in tabular form his estimate of the average monthly cost to the Exchequer when an adult male worker on average weekly earnings, (on the basis of all industry and services covered by the "New Earnings Survey", updated if appropriate by the average earnings index, and assuming pay was not affected by absence) becomes unemployed, showing separately (a) for single men and (b) for a married man with two children, one aged under five years and the other between five and 10 years, the following disbursements: (i) unemployment benefit, (ii) supplementary benefit, (iii) income tax rebate, (iv) rent and rate rebate, and the following losses of revenue: (v) from income tax, (vi) from taxes on consumption of goods and services, (vii) from employers' national insurance contributions and (viii) from employees' national insurance contribution.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Inland Revenue Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the level of Inland Revenue staff during the next three financial years.

Mr. Moore: The Government's plans for Civil Service manpower for the period to 1988 were published on 22 January 1985 in the Public Expenditure White Paper—Cmnd. 9428—"The Government's Expenditure plans 1985-86 to 1987-88." The figures for the Inland Revenue were as follows:

1 April	Number
1985	69,724
1986	69,274
1987	66,274
1988	62,874

Public Expenditure

Mr. Malone asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for the latest years now available, identifiable public expenditure by programme in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and the United Kingdom expressed (a) in cash terms, (b) as a percentage of United Kingdom total identifiable public expenditure, (c) as an amount per capita and (d) as an amount per capita expressed as a percentage of the United Kingdom amount per capita.

Mr. Peter Rees: Tables 1 to 5 show figures of identifiable public expenditure according to main function in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. These are the only available figures comparing public expenditure on programmes in the four countries of the United Kingdom. The analysis is presented for the past five years, the only period for which data are available on a consistent basis. The term "identifiable expenditure" refers to expenditure that can be identified from official records as having been incurred in a particular country. Table 6 compares, for the latest year, 1983-84, expenditure in Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland programmes with total identifiable expenditure in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland respectively. It shows that identifiable expenditure has a wider coverage than expenditure within the responsibility of the Secretaries of State in the case of Scotland or Wales, and in the case of Northern Ireland, it has a slightly wider coverage than the Northern Ireland programme in the public expenditure survey. This table also shows all unidentifiable expenditure by programme.

Unidentifiable expenditure includes expenditure on defence, overseas aid and other overseas services which are deemed to have been incurred on behalf of the United Kingdom as a whole. It also includes Government net lending to, and the market and overseas borrowing of, the public corporations, because of the difficulties of allocating the finance to expenditure in particular countries. Total identifiable public expenditure represents about 80 per cent. of total public expenditure on programmes.

The extent to which expenditure can be identified may vary from year to year and between countries. The coverage of particular programmes can also vary between countries — for example, in Northern Ireland, expenditure on Arts and Libraries is contained in the education programme.

The following tables use the terms and definitions of the Public Expenditure White Paper "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428). The figures have therefore been classified to the definitions of public expenditure used in Cmnd. 9428 and may differ slightly from those published previously. The territorial analysis exercise was carried out before the figures in Cmnd. 9428 became available. The latter incorporate later information and show total expected outturn for 1983-84 to be £102·3 billion, that is, some £300 million higher than the planning total shown in table 6. The additional sum will be incorporated in the next territorial analysis.

SCOTLAND

Duich Moss (Peat Stripping)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what letters he has received from the European Commission inquiring about his decision approving peat stripping from Duich Moss (Islay); and if he will publish his response made to such inquiries.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has received no letters from the European Commission on this subject.

Garnock Valley (Redevelopment)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider re-establishing the task force, originally set up by his Department in 1979, to promote the redevelopment of the site at Garnock valley previously occupied by the recently closed steel works.

Mr. Younger: No. The role of the Garnock valley task force has now been taken over by the Garnock valley development executive, and the executive, supported by the Scottish Development Agency, will be able to undertake any redevelopment which may be necessary once the future of the site has been considered by British Steel Corporation.

Hunterston A Power Station

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide information on the output and discharges from Hunterston A power station in the calendar year 1984 on the same basis as was provided for power stations in England and Wales by the Secretary of State for Energy on 25 January, Official Report, columns 545-7.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Following is the information for 1983-84:

Thermal output (Gwh)	Fuel discharged (tonnes u)
8,828	66

Fenitrothion

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost to the Forestry Commission of the control experiment directed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in 1984 in which 142 hectares of land in Speymouth were aerially sprayed with Fenitrothion.

Mr. John MacKay: The cost to the Forestry Commission was approximately £2,500.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those species of woodland birds known to be involved in the control experiment directed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in 1984 in which 142 hectares of Forestry Commission land in Speymouth were aerially sprayed with Fenitrothion.

Mr. John MacKay: The purpose of the experiment was to test the effect of the treatment on a range of species selected as being representative of the population of resident breeding birds. These were: robin, chaffinch, willow warbler, goldcrest and coal tit.

Police Surveillance

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria have been laid down for the use of equipment in police surveillance in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Guidelines on the use of equipment in police surveillance operations were issued to chief constables of Scottish forces in March 1978. These explain that the primary purpose of the use of such equipment must be to help confirm or dispel a suspicion of serious crime and that the authorising officer must be satisfied on each occasion that the use of such equipment is operationally necessary, feasible and justified in all the circumstances. The guidelines are being reviewed at present and when the review is completed I shall place a copy of the revised guidelines in the Library of the House.

Teachers (Pay)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from Scottish teachers' unions in respect of establishing pay review bodies.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The teachers' side of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education (SJNC(SE)), which comprises representatives from four teachers' unions, has asked for an independent review of teachers' pay in Scotland. My right hon. Friend has indicated that in his view the appropriate procedure would be to undertake a review of both pay and conditions of service within the existing statutory machinery by the SJNC(SE) itself.

Regional Grant Aid

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on what basis the Scottish Development Agency has stated that regional grant aid on offer in Scotland was insufficiently large to attract to Scotland the proposed £165 million investment from Advanced Micro Devices Ltd. of California.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Advanced Micro Devices' decision not to locate in Scotland was a matter for the commercial judgment of the company. Within the ceilings set by the European Community, Scotland offers highly attractive regional grant aid, and additional benefits are available in the form of European Community loans and enterprise zone fiscal incentives. But the availability of grants is only one of many factors influencing the choice of location for internationally mobile projects.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for felling licences for broadleaved woodlands clearance were rejected by the Forestry Commission in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date against the advice of the Agriculture Ministries and Departments.

Mr. John Mackay [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 243]: The Agriculture Departments do not normally provide the Forestry Commission with advice on whether felling licence applications should be granted for the conversion to agricultural use.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dwellings are owned by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive at the latest date.

Mr. Scott: This a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that at 31 December 1984 the Executive owned 183,612 dwellings, including occupied and vacant dwellings in redevelopment areas, short and long-term voids and vacant dwellings scheduled for demolition.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total rental income of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

Mr. Scott: This a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that gross rental income from dwellings and garages in 1984-85 is estimated at £128 million.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dwellings are let by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive at the latest date.

Mr. Scott: This a matter for the Northern Ireland Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the number of dwellings let at 31 December 1984 was 175,014; this excludes occupied dwellings in redevelopment areas.

Sinn Fein (Meetings)

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many meetings have taken place since he took office between civil servants in Northern Ireland Government Departments and Sinn Fein representatives to discuss constituency matters; and who have been the Sinn Fein representatives involved.

Mr. Hurd: Since September 1984 there have been two meetings between officials of Northern Ireland Departments and Sinn Fein councillors. Both meetings took place at local level and related to constituency matters. In addition, officials of Northern Ireland Department have attended six meetings with district councils and council committees, at which Sinn Fein councillors were present, together with other councillors from Belfast city council and Omagh district council. I do not believe that it would be right to give details of the individuals involved.

Orlit Houses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to introduce an Order in Council to authorise the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to re-purchase Orlit dwellings.

Mr. Scott: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) on 7 February 1985 at column 649.

Loans (Interest Rates)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider ways and means of reducing the burden on farmers who took out loans at fixed rates of interest from the Department of Agriculture (Northern Ireland) in the late 1970s when interest rates were very high.

Dr. Boyson: No, but there is no penalty for early repayment of such loans and borrowers are free to re-finance their borrowings from the private sector if they so wish.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the latest figures for (a) the total number of people arrested on miners' pickets lines over the past 11 months and (b) the total number of policemen injured while on picket duty.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Up to 18 February the figures were as follows:

(a) 9,355 persons arrested in connection with the mining dispute.

(b) 1,389 police officers injured while carrying out duties connected with the dispute.

Notes:

(1) The figures do not distinguish arrests and injuries on the picket lines from those which occurred elsewhere in connection with the dispute.

(2) Where the same person has been arrested (or injured) on different occasions, more than one entry will have been made in the figures given.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will provide for the latest convenient date, a table indicating neighbourhood watch schemes currently operating in each London borough;

(2) how many neighbourhood watch schemes are currently operating in London.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that, at the end of December 1984 the latest date for which collated information is available, there were 1,282 neighbourhood watch schemes operating within the Metropolitan police district. A breakdown of the number in each London borough and in other areas within the Metropolitan police district is currently being prepared and I will arrange for this information to be sent to the hon. Member as soon as it is available.

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to promote the development of neighbourhood watch schemes to combat crime and vandalism and, in particular, intimidation of old people.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The introduction of neighbourhood watch or any other crime prevention scheme receiving police support is a matter for the chief officer of police of the area concerned. The Home Office crime prevention unit and the Home Office crime prevention centre, Stafford, have issued joint guidance for police forces introducing neighbourhood watch schemes, and we are providing forces with publicity material to support such schemes.

Black Community

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about broadcasting for the black community.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received a variety of representations about broadcasting from a number of ethnic minority groups. These have included comments on individual programmes and the provision of programmes in specific ethnic minority languages, and inquiries about the use of community radio to broadcast to ethnic minority groups.

Nuclear Burst

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training courses are available for local authority emergency planning staff on the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse and protective measures.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The majority of courses held at the Civil Defence college cover this effect. I would also refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) on 21 January at column 272.

European Assembly Elections (Candidates)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if returning officers check and record the citizenship of nominated candidates for European Assembly elections.

Mr. Mellor: No. A candidate is not required to state his citizenship, and returning officers have no power to enquire into it. However, a candidate must state in his consent to nomination that to the best of his knowledge and belief he is not disqualified for election to the European Parliament: a person is so disqualified if he is not a British or other Commonwealth citizen or a citizen of the Republic of Ireland. The election of a person who appears to be disqualified may be questioned by an election petition under part III of the Representation of the People Act 1983.

Arrested Persons (Toilet Facilities)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that all people arrested on disorderly charges have access to wash and brush-up facilities before they are required to appear in court; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The conditions for the detention of people in police cutody are at present governed by the judges' rules and administrative directions, which provide that reasonable arrangements should be made for the comfort of those in custody. The code of practice on the detention, treatment and questioning of suspects to be made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 will provide that access to toilet and washing facilities must be provided. These provisions apply to all persons detained in police custody for whatever offence.

Misuse of Drugs Act 1971

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many directions and temporary directions have been made under section 13 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 since 1975.

Mr. Mellor: Under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, directions may be made against medical practitioners under the provisions of section 13(1) (which deals with prescribing certain controlled drugs to addicts when unlicensed and failure to notify cases of addiction) and section 13(2) (which deals with irresponsible prescribing).

The number of directions under section 13 made from 1975 to date is 12.

Temporary directions are made under the provisions of section 15 of the Act and subsequently have to be confirmed by reference to a tribunal.

The number of temporary directions made from 1975 to date is five of which three have been confirmed by tribunals and are included in the number quoted above.

Drugs Branch Inspectorate

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff are currently serving in the drugs branch inspectorate; at what grades; and with what relevant qualifications.

Mr. Mellor: One chief inspector (senior principal (grade 6)), three senior inspectors (senior executive officers) and 11 inspectors (higher executive officers). There are no specific qualifications for posts in the inspectorate. Staff are chosen having regard to their overall experience and personal qualities.

Drug Addicts (Notification)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases since 1975 disciplinary action has been taken against a doctor for failing to notify an addict or suspected addict to the Chief Medical Officer of his Department.

Mr. Mellor: Under the provisions of section 13(1) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, and on the recommendation of a tribunal, a direction may be made against a medical practitioner who fails to notify cases of addiction, prohibiting him from prescribing controlled drugs. From 1975 to date, no directions have been made solely in respect of failure to notify, but in this period nine doctors have been referred to tribunals in cases where failure to notify formed part of the allegation. This resulted in five directions being made.

Devizes Police Station (Incident)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Wiltshire on the circumstances under which a woman was held in custody at Devizes police station on the nights of 16 and 17 February; on whose authority she was held; and what was the charge;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Wiltshire on the circumstances under which four women were held in custody at Devizes police station on the night of Friday 15 February; on whose authority they were held there; and what were the charges.

Mr. Brittan: I understand from the chief constable of Wiltshire that four women were arrested by Ministry of Defence police on 15 November after an incident during a military exercise on Salisbury Plain. They were taken to Devizes police station and held in police custody in accordance with section 43 of the Magistrates' Court Act 1980 until it was practicable to bring them before a court. They appeared in court on the morning of Saturday 16 November and were charged with trespassing on Ministry of Defence land. The woman held in Devizes police station on the nights of 16 and 17 February had been arrested in similar circumstances and was detained in police custody under the same authority. She appeared before magistrates on the morning of Monday 18 February and was charged with trespassing on Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why a special magistrate's court was held in Devizes police station on Saturday 16 February.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that Devizes police station is appointed as an occasional court-house under section 147 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 and that the magistrates' court sits there whenever there are cases to be heard and its normal accommodation is unavailable, as happened on Saturday 16 February.

Parliamentary Constituencies (Reviews)

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Boundary Commissions for England and Wales intend to conduct any interim review of parliamentary constituencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The Boundary Commissions for England and Wales have informed me that they intend to conduct interim reviews of 28 parliamentary constituencies under the powers provided in section 2(3) of the House of Commons (Redistribution of Seats) Act 1949. The constituencies concerned are as follows:

ENVIRONMENT

Concessionary Television Licence

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will estimate, for the latest year in which this is possible, the total cost borne by district councils in England and Wales in the collection and payment of the 5p concessionary television licence;

(2) if he will list (a) the district councils in England and Wales which collect the 5p concessionary licences from eligible tenants and (b) the district councils in England and Wales which elect to pay the 5p concessionary television licence themselves, rather than collect it from eligible tenants;

(3) if he will estimate, for the latest year for which this is possible, the total number of man days expended by district councils in England and Wales in the collection and payment of the 5p concessionary television licence.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Central London (Office Space)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, as part of his planned future responsibility for strategic planning in Greater London, he will obtain and publish in the Official Report an estimate of the office space now vacant in central London and the equivalent figures for each of the preceeding two years.

Mr. Macfarlane: My Department's planning research programme for 1985-86 includes a project to ascertain the character and extent of offices in London and the south-east having regard to current and future rates of office demand. An estimate of office space vacant in central London is likely to form part of that project.

It will be for the London Planning Commission to advise my right hon. Friend on his future responsibility for strategic planning in Greater London. Their advice will be published.

Radioactive Material (Lumns Lane, Salford)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will quantify the amount of radioactive material which he has given permission to be dumped at Lumns Lane, Salford; whether there are any other sites available in the Greater Manchester area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The authorisation issued under section 6 of the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 permits the disposal at this site in any one month of waste containing up to 1,400 megabequerels of radioactivity. The site was originally suggested for consideration by Greater Manchester council in 1982, though it subsequently raised formal objection to its use for this purpose. The council did in fact carry out a survey of other waste disposal sites within Greater Manchester, but was unable to identify any alternative which could be made available. The Radiochemical Inspectorate of the Department are satisfied that the Lumns Lane site is suitable for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste as now authorised, and that there are no grounds for fearing any harm to local residents or others from it.

Refuse Disposal

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing such information as he has for each appropriate local authority in England on the average cost per ton of refuse disposed, indicating for each the main method of disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in its publication "Waste Disposal Statistics".

Its "1983-84 Actuals" contains the latest figures and shows that the average cost of waste disposal for English county waste disposal authorities in 1983-84 was £7·60 per tonne.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply on 29 November 1984, Official Report, column 558, if he will publish the expressions of support for the abolition of the Greater London council that he has received from Conservative leaders of London borough councils.

Sir George Young: I have asked the chairman of the London Boroughs Association, who initiated the letter of support subscribed to by the leaders, to sent the hon. Member a copy.

East Country Yard, Southwark

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the London Docklands Development Corporation intends to purchase compulsorily East Country Yard in Southwark.

Sir George Young: Yes.

ILEA (Precept)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial information, necessary to determine a precept in respect of the Inner London Education Authority, was not available to his Department at the time of making the rate precept limitation order and had to be replaced by assumptions of his own making.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has always made it clear that he would have been prepared to discuss the calculation of proposed precept limits in the context of negotiations with the individual authority about a different maximum.

Urban Programme

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources he is proposing to make available under the urban programme in 1985-86 to the other designated districts.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Despite the great pressure on public expenditure this year, the allocation for 1985-86 for industrikal and commercial projects to be carried out by the other designated districts will be the same in cash terms as that for 1984-85. The total sum available for allocation is £8 million and the provisional allocation on a regional basis is:

	£ million
Northern
Hartlepool, Langbaurgh	1·550
North West
Burnley, Wigan	1·100
Merseyside
Sefton, St. Helens	1·100
Yorkshire and Humberside
Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham, South Yorkshire	1·850
West Midlands
Walsall	0·550
Greater London
Ealing, Haringey, Southwark, Newham, Greenwich, Lewisham	1·850

Allocations to individual authorities are made subject to the quality of individual projects submitted.

Additional resources, over and above these allocations will be available to these authorities for approved urban development grant schemes.

Caravan Sites Act 1968

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last reviewed the operation of the Caravan Sites Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his answer, 18 February 1985, c. 328-9]: In my reply to my hon. Friend's question on Monday 18 February I said that I had no plans for further amendments at present to the Caravan Sites Act 1968. There are, of course, a number of technical amendments, consequential upon the proposals to abolish metropolitan county councils. These are contained in schedule 8 to the Local Government Bill now before Parliament.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the cost of the Trident system, calculated at the current sterling-dollar exchange rate.

Mr. Lee: As stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 29 January (Columns 134-137) the current Trident estimate is £9,285 million at 1984-85 prices and at £1 = $1·38. $1·38 is the rate used by the Department for this year's recosting of the defence programme.

In view of the public interest in exchange rates, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has made available to the Select Committee on Defence the Public Accounts Committee an indication of the effects of changes in the exchange rates on programme costs, so that those wishing to predict the effect of possible exchange rate changes over the procurement period are able to do so. The following table shows the broad exchange rate effect of a 1 cent. change around the following alternative exchange rates:

$=£1	£ million
1·0	55
1·1	47
1·2	40
1·3	35
1·4	30
1·5	25
1·6	22
1·7	20

The above figures are based on the assumption that the chosen rate of exchange will remain constant throughout the life of the project.

Hong Kong Ferry

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department will place a further order for a Hong Kong ferry.

Mr. Lee: This department has not ordered any Hong Kong ferries nor has any plans to do so.

Single Role Minehunter

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department will place its order for the construction of the first single role minehunter.

Mr. Lee: A single tender has been received from Vosper Thornycroft (UK) Ltd. It is being considered. No decision has yet been taken.

Mines Counter-measure Vessels

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department will place its order for the 12th and 13th mines counter-measure vessels.

Mr. Lees: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 5 February at col. 511.

RAF Molesworth

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for new bylaws under the Military Lands Act relating to the regulation of access by unauthorised persons at RAF Molesworth; and if he will make a statement on the powers to be taken.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend, in exercise of his powers under the Military Lands Act 1892, is proposing to make byelaws covering Ministry of Defence land at RAF Molesworth. The Act requires the proposed byelaws to be advertised in the locality before they are made, and this will be done for a period of 21 days from 25 February.

The purpose of the proposed byelaws is to regulate the use of RAF Molesworth for defence purposes. The main provisions will make it an offence for unauthorised persons to enter the defined area or to interfere with or damage Crown property, including the security fence. Persons suspected committing an offence will be liable to arrest and to be brought before a court of summary jurisdiction. The maximum penalty for an offence against any byelaw is £100. Similar sets of byelaws are in force at other defence establishments.

Ascension Island (NAAFI Stores)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence when was the last occasion that only Bulgarian beef was available in the NAAFI store on Ascension Island.

Mr. Lee: NAAFI does not supply fresh meat to Her Majesty's Forces on Ascension Island and the origin of beef supplied as a commercial service to the civilian community is a matter for them.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the practice in relation to the offering of British beef for sale at the NAAFI store at Ascension Island.

Mr. Lee: NAAFI does not supply fresh meat to Her Majesty's Forces on Ascension Island. Any beef held in the NAAFI store is provided as part of NAAFI's commercial services to the civilian community and is a matter for them.

Departmental Staff (Education Grants)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to give his Department's employees postings that will permit their offspring to obtain higher education grants.

Mr. Lee: I cannot give the assurance sought.

Rules governing eligibility for higher education grants (which apply equally to the public and private sectors) are a matter for the Department of Education and Science, but of course my Department does its best to avoid such difficulties for its staff when they are posted.

Departmental Cleaning Contracts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many private firms have been awarded cleaning contracts by his Department's establishments.

Mr. Lee: About 75 private firms have cleaning contracts, arranged centrally, with the Department; there are others of small value which are let locally.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence what guidelines he has issued to companies who have been awarded cleaning contracts by his Department's establishments in respect of levels of pay for employees.

Mr. Lee: Following the decision of the House of Commons to rescind the fair wages resolution, levels of pay are a matter for contractors and their employees; contracts no longer set guidelines.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what security checks were made on the Clean Industrial Company prior to the award of the contract for the cleaning of his Department's buildings.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what agreement exists between the Clean Industrial Company and his Department for the cleaning of his Department's buildings; and what are the conditions of employment for cleaners contained in the agreement.

Mr. Lee: There are contracts with Clean Industrial Services Ltd. which are standard for office cleaning work but conditions of employment for cleaners are not included. Conditions of employment for cleaners are decided between the contractor and the employees.

Clean Industrial Services Ltd.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether officers of the Clean Industrial Company have signed the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what powers he has vested in Clean Industrial to monitor security and vet employees working in his Department's buildings.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of the cleaning contract his Department has with Clean Industrial for his Department's buildings; and on what basis he calculates savings accruing from privatisation of the cleaning services in these buildings.

Mr. Lee: Clean Industrial Services Ltd. has a number of contracts with the Department including two for cleaning headquarters buildings, but the price is commercially confidential between the Department and the contractor concerned. Calculation of savings is on the basis of a comparison of the cost of the service performed by a contractor with the cost of the work by direct labour.

Cleaners (Vetting)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what procedures his Department uses for vetting cleaners for security purposes.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Mrs. Molly Balkinson

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations took place between the Clean Industrial company and his Department over (a) the security vetting and (b) the sacking of Mrs. Molly Balkinson.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Arms Exports

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the payment arrangements for United Kingdom arms exported to Third world countries; and what are the terms of any credit given.

Mr. Lee: When selling arms to Third world and other countries a number of factors need to be taken into consideration including the nature of the equipment, the state of the economy of the customer and the value of the sale. Payment arrangement and credit terms vary in accordance with these factors.

TRANSPORT

A303 (Road Schemes)

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to speed up progress on road schemes along the A303.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The six schemes in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England: 1983" main trunk road programme and reserve list are progressing on target for work to start in the periods indicated. It is not practicable to advance these start dates which take into account the time required to carry out the statutory and other procedures.

PRIME MINISTER

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of the Attorney General's statement on 12 February, Official Report, column 180, and the papers laid before the House by the Secretary of State for Defence on 18 February, she will make it the practice of Her Majesty's Government to consider answering on their merits individual parliamentary questions about discussions between Ministers and the advice given by officials to Ministers.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

No. The Government have made it very clear that this was an entirely—I hope uniquely—exceptional case.

Polaris Submarines (Radiation)

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister whether she will establish a survey to investigate the effects of radiation on service men and the families of service men who have served on board Polaris submarines; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Radiation levels in Polaris, as in all other Royal Navy nuclear powered submarines, are monitored continuously to ensure that they remain at all times within levels recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. These levels have never been exceeded nor has there ever been a leakage of radioactivity which has affected the safety of a submarine crew.

There is no evidence to justify an inquiry of the sort suggested.

Official Information (Leak)

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister, if the discovery of a leak of official information from the Ministry of Defence to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was notified to the Security Commission.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.
No.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Goods

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give consideration to providing a computer database of imported manufactured goods with data available on regionally-based terminals to enable British companies to identify potential markets for investment.

Mr. Butcher: I am not convinced that such a database would be a cost-effective means of helping companies with their market research. Import statistics based on Customs and Excise returns are already available from the Department. In addition, the Government have encouraged private sector initiatives aimed at identifying opportunities for United Kingdom companies, notably exhibitions of imported products arranged for that purpose.

Hall Russell Shipbuilders, Aberdeen

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many offers to purchase Hall Russell Shipbuilders, Aberdeen, have been received by his Department as at 15 February.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I can confirm that initial offers have been received for Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell. It is not in the interest of British Shipbuilders or the Government to reveal the names or numbers of bidders while negotiations are in train.

Falmouth Shiprepair Ltd.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will explain the reason for the delay in the privatisation of Falmouth Shiprepair Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: British Shipbuilders has been negotiating with several potential purchasers but has not yet been able to reach an unconditional agreement on terms which the corporation regards as satisfactory. It is hoped that the sale will be completed shortly.

Ferrous Scrap

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what results have been achieved through representations made to the EEC Commission and to the Italian Industry Minister concerning the Italian Government's decision to subsidise imported ferrous scrap.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 18 February 1985, c. 362-63]: In early August the Italian Council of Ministers agreed on a draft Bill authorising payments of a subsidy of 50 lira per kilogram towards the import of ferrous scrap from third countries. The Government made representations to the Commission about the proposed measure in August and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State raised the issue with the Italian Industry Minister on 2 October.

I understand that no payments have been made to Italian scrap importers under the recently introduced Transport Subsidy Act. Such aid requires the approval of the European Commission and to date this has not been given.

Support for Innovation Programme (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he is satisfied that industrialists in Yorkshire and Humberside region are sufficiently aware of the availability of grants under the support for innovation programme;

(2) what percentage of the total amount of money paid in grants under the support for innovation programme has been received in Yorkshire and Humberide region.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 18 February 1985, c. 363]: As my hon. Friend announced last November, the Department is currently reviewing its policy in support of industrial research and development. While this exercise is under way, support for certain categories of projects has been curtailed including research and development projects in single firms. I cannot anticipate the outcome of the review but an announcement of future policy will be made shortly.

I hope that firms in all regions accept that the Department's aim is to encourage and assist British trade, industry and commerce. If firms in Yorkshire and Humberside are uncertain about the range of support that is available, I urge them to make contact with the Department's office in Leeds.

Of the amount spent under the support for innovation programme since it was launched on 6 May 1982, firms in Yorkshire and Humberside have accounted for 7·9 per cent. of the offers made, 4·4 per cent. of the value of assistance offered and 3·7 per cent. of the assistance paid.

Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give preferential rates of grant in assisted areas to promote high technology development under the support for innovation programme.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 18 February 1985, c. 363]: The long term aim of support for innovation is that of wealth creation. In order to maximise this aspect, it is important to support those projects which offer the best potential rate of return to the country. Obviously, this can be done only on a national basis. In so far as we respond to the best projects, the scheme is demand-led.

Departmental Services

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 579, if he will indicate the profit and loss or income and expenditure account and the balance sheet of the services and groups of services listed in his previous answer.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 21 February 1985, c. 508]: The costs and income in 1983-84 of the services listed in my answer of 6 February are as follows:

Services and groups of services the charges for which are aimed to recover full cost

Soviet Union

Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government policy over maintaining freedom of trade between the united Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 21 February 1985, c. 508]: The Government are strongly in favour of the further development of this trade on the basis of mutual benefit. It is the Government's policy to promote freedom of trade between the two countries within the constraints imposed by our international obligations.

Unit Costs

Mr. Parris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the movement in United Kingdom unit costs, including non-wage factors such as employers' national insurance contributions, on a common currency basis compared with the United States of America, Canada, Japan, West Germany, France and Italy between 1975, 1977 and 1979, respectively, and the present day, extrapolating the cost trend in national currencies apparent over the last two quarters for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 19 February 1985, c. 434]: I have been asked to reply.

The information is in the table:

Unit labour costs in manufacturing*

	Percentage changes 1975 to 1984	1977 to 1984	1979 to 1984

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Whitefish

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what account was taken, in drawing up the United Kingdom's area VII f/g (west coast) whitefish quotas for sole and plaice for 1984-85 of the fact that the plaice catch during the quota reference period was more than twice that for sole;

(2) what account was taken when drawing up the United Kingdom's VII f/g plaice quota for 1984-85 of the predominance of Belgian beam trawler activity during the reference period.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom quotas for sole and plaice in area VII f/g for 1985, like those of Belgium and other Member States, were calculated on the basis of the Member States' shares of each stock that were fixed by the common fisheries policy settlement of January 1983. These shares have "staying power" for the lifetime of the current CFP. The United Kingdom's share of the total allowable catch for VII f/g plaice reflects our historic performance during the reference period of 1973-78 amended slightly to take account of the application of the "Hague Preference" in favour of Ireland. In the case of VII f/g sole we secured a share substantially in excess of our historic performance.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the United Kingdom and the French plaice quotas for 1984-85 have been set at 10 times the sole quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The only area where United Kingdom and French plaice quotas are currently about 10 times their sole quotas is the Irish Sea (VIIa). These quotas reflect the current levels of total allowable catch (TAC) for each stock and the member states' percentage shares of the TACs. The common fisheries policy settlement of January 1983 fixed member states' shares of each stock independently, taking account of catches during the 1973-78 reference period. The TAC's are based on the latest scientific advice on the state of the stocks, the plaice TAG in this area being 4 times as large as the sole TAC.

Agricultural Products (Exports)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total value of exports of (a) cereals and (b) other agricultural products in each year since 1979 in actual and constant prices; and what is the percentage increase in each case in constant prices showing 1979 as 100.

Mr. MacGregor: The table shows the information requested:

UK Exports of Cereals and Other Agricultural Products

Pesticides

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to review the safety clearance or approval of pesticides containing (a) dieldrin, (b) aldicarb, (c) methyl isothiocyanate, (d) 2,4,5-T, (e) captan, (f) thiram, (g) dichlorvos, (h) aldrin, (i) triadimefon, (j) oxydemeton methyl, (k) captafol, (l) triazophos, (m) phosalone and (n) paraquat.

Mr. MacGregor: The safety position of pesticides is kept under continuous review.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has collected information on the volume of pesticide product or active ingredient used in any case or with respect to particular areas; and if he will publish such data.

Mr. MacGregor: The Pesticide Usage Survey Group collects data on pesticide usage crop by crop, and when a cycle is completed publishes a review of the situation in agriculture, horticulture and forestry together. The review for the period 1980-83 is now in preparation and will be available to hon. Members later this year. The data is presented in terms of area of crop and tonnes of pesticide sprayed, and by crop types.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for which pesticides clearance has been withdrawn under the pesticides safety precautions scheme, wholly or mainly on grounds of the hazard they posed to human or animal health or safety or the environment.

Mr. MacGregor: Pesticides whose clearance has been withdrawn under the pesticides safety precaution scheme for safety reasons, since the inception of the scheme:

Antu
Azobenzene
Cadmium compounds
Calcium arsenate
Chlordecone
DDT Epdrin
Ethylene dibromide
Hexachlorobenzene
Inorganic fluorides
Mercuric Chloride
Methyl mercury
Nitrofen
Phenylmercury salioylate
Potassium arsenate
Selenium compounds
Sodium arsenite
1,1, 2,2—tetracholorethane

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 108, in which of the past 10 years for which records are available his Department assesses pesticide usage to have been the minimum consistent with efficient food production.

Mr. MacGregor: It has been the Government's policy to impose strict safety standards on the use of pesticides since the establishment of the Advisory Committee for Pesticides in 1955. Ministers have been publishing advice to farmers and growers on the efficacy of pesticides under the agricultural chemicals approved scheme since 1961, with the intention that only the most effective pesticides for a particular operation should be employed. This policy was made more explicit in 1983 with the publication of the Government's response to the Seventh Report of the Royal Commission for Environmental Pollution when the Government accepted the Royal Commission's recommendation that "it should be a declared policy aim to reduce pesticide usage to a minimum consistent with food production."

It is not possible to monitor the success of this policy year by year, but the introduction of a criterion of efficacy for approval under the Food and Environment Protection Bill is intended to make a significant contribution to its achievement.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those publications produced by or on behalf of his Department which enable farmers to determine whether pesticide usage on an agricultural enterprise has been reduced to the minimum consistent with efficient agricultural and horticultural production.

Mr. MacGregor: The Ministry's Agricultural Development and Advisory Service and the Agriculture and Food Research Council are researching into more efficient application techniques, integrated pest control systems, pest and disease-resistant plant varieties and better forecasting techniques for pest and disease incidence. The benefits of this work are systematically passed on to farmers and growers by a variety of means, which do not necessarily involve publications. However ADAS produces a range of leaflets devoted to pest control and managed disease control which advise farmers and others on when spraying would be most effective.

I am sending examples to the hon. Member.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported coffee from Angola, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, the Ivory Coast, Kenya, Mexico, New Guinea, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Rwanda, Uganda and Venezuela;

(2) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported (a) peppers and (b) strawberries from Mexico;

(3) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported bananas from Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala and Mexico;

(4) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported sugar from Brazil, Columbia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, India and Thailand;

(5) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon, and malathion on imported olives from Italy and Spain;

(6) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported tapioca from Thailand;

(7) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported cacao from Cost Rica and Ecuador;

(8) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported tea from Sri Lanka and India;

(9) whether he will carry out tests for the presence of DDT, DDE, BHC, lindane, dieldrin, heptachlor, diazinon and malathion on imported tomatoes from Mexico and Spain.

Mr. MacGregor: The working party on pesticide residues which reports to the interdepartmental steering group on food surveillance and the Advisory committee on Pesticides monitors foods, including imported foods, for a wide range of pesticide residues frequently including the organochlorine and organophospherous compounds mentioned in the question. A desciption of the methods of working of the working party, including ways in which priorities for residue analysis on specific foods are decided and pursued within the resources currently available for these activities has been published (The Ninth Report of the steering group on food surveillance). This report contains information on for example the analysis of total diet samples, which would have included bananas, for the organochlorines, and similarly, information on the organophosphorus compounds in these samples.

I expect a further comprehensive report of the more recent activities of this working party to be published later this year. This will present inter alia the results of a survey of pesticide residues on home-produced and imported fruits and vegetables including the organochlorines and certain organophosphorus compounds.

No recent work has been carried out under the auspices of the working party on organochlorine and organophosphorus residues in sugar, coffee, cocoa and tapioca. Further work on tea has recently been proposed.

All imported foodstuffs are subject to control under the Imported Food Regulations (1984), the enforcement of which is the responsibility of the port health authorities or of local authorities inland where Customs examination is not completed at the port of entry.

Paraquat

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the grounds on which the herbicide paraquat has been banned in West Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: We understand that the West German authorities are concerned that on certain soils biologically available residues of paraquat may persist. We await a full explanation from the West German authorities, which has recently been requested by West Germany's EC partners.

Alachlor

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has studied recent cancer investigations made by the Environment Protection Agency in the United States of America, relating to the herbicide alachlor; if this pesticide is in use in the United Kingdom; and what plans he has to issue a warning to users.

Mr. MacGregor: Full details of certain replacement studies of alachlor, which is used on a very small scale in the United Kingdom, have been submitted to my Department. Ministers are taking the advice of the Advisory Committee for Pesticides on the appropriate reaction to this data.

Conservation

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ensure that conservation matters are fully taken into account when all applications for grants submitted to his Department are considered.

Mr. Jopling: In accordance with my statutory responsibilities, it has been my Department's policy for some years to have conservation aspects of claims for capital grants taken into account.

Farmers (Subsidy Allocations)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to amend subsidy allocations for farmers.

Mr. Jopling: Planned expenditure for agriculture is set out in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428), published on 22 January 1985. These plans will be reviewed during 1985, taking account of pricing decisions reached under the common agricultural policy.

Eggs Authority

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make an announcement about the review of the Eggs Authority.

Mr. Jopling: The other Agricultural Ministers and I are glad to say that the right hon. Lord Peyton of Yeovil has agreed to lead a small committee which will carry out the review of the Eggs Authority. The other members of the committee will be Professor Denis Britton, CBE and Mr. Oscar Colburn, CBE.

Their terms of reference will be to determine whether there is a continuing need for the Eggs Authority and, if so, whether any changes are required to its constitution, functions and financial provisions and to make recommendations.

In carrying out their task the committee will consult all the interests concerned with the future of the Eggs Authority. It is our intention that the review committee's report should be published and presented to Parliament.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 73

SESSION 1984-85

11th February—22nd February 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers ruling and statement'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
